To relieve the price and profit compression, mini-mills need growth. That gets you back to the technology for opening new product areas. Chaparral looks for significant gains in the quality bar market through electromagnetic stirring and horizontal casting.

Quanex Corp. has used rotary casting and extensive ladle treatment to establish a solid position in the alloy and special bar quality markets. The company's success is pointed up by the November start of a new mill at Fort Smith, Ark.

Raritan River Steel Corp., which is going after more of the plain rod business, is upgrading an already efficient complex. Raritan River's electric furnace is being converted to the eccentric bottom tapping design of Mannesmann Demag. The company's Morgan mill is having its finishing speed boosted to 20,000 fpm.

There are numerous other advances. Nucor is installing a direct current furnace. "We all have to keep our eye on the plasma furnace," said Mr. Weise of Florida Steel.

There is widespread activity but the big breakthrough could be in the flat rolled area. About half the steel shipped in the U.S. is some form of sheet. The key to a mini-sheet mill is successful development of a thin slab caster.

"We have discarded everything except going to an inch and a half or thinner," said Mr. Iverson of Nucor.

"Part of this depends on how you define a mini-mill," he explained. "With the minimum thickness of a slab about 6 inches today, if you're going to make it 50 inches wide and it comes out 60 or 70 inches a minute, you're looking at a million tons.

"By my definition, that's not a mini-mill. Besides, the capital cost of putting in a caster of that size is so great the mini-mill wouldn't be competitive in the market."

There is another important reason for getting a thin slab. "It isn't too difficult to coil an inch and a half," said Mr. Iverson. "If you cast an inch and a half and make five passes on a Steckel mill, you could go to the mini-mill to make hot bands."

The economic impact of this combination could be enormous. "We're not looking at any process that wouldn't reduce the cost at least $50 a ton under present processes and most of them are $100 a ton. You've got to have that kind of saving or there's no sense in doing it."

The savings mentioned were in relation to hot bands with conventional continuous casting and conventional rolling on a hot strip mill.

Mr. Iverson has said that it would be three to five years before minimill sheet production became a commercial reality. However, the physical casting of thin slabs could come a lot sooner. In late December, Nucor was negotiated with two groups of process sponsors on an agreement to build a pilot plant.

"We have not signed anything as yet, but we hope to in the next 30 or 60 days," said Mr. Iverson.

THE STECKEL MILL

As has been indicated, the Steckel mill figures prominently in plans for production of sheet.

The Steckel is a hot reversing mill which coils the steel in furnaces after each pass. This design has been used for years, but it has been replaced by continuous strip mills in most sheet operations. It was generally thought that the Steckel couldn't provide the quality required by sheet users.

Now the hot reversing mills may be making a comeback. "There are 20 operating Steckel mills in the world," said Mr. Wilson of IPSCO.

Much of IPSCO's flat rolled steel has gone into oil country tubular products and linepipe. This is fairly typical; skelp for pipe has been a major product of the Steckel mills of carbon steel producers.

Steckel mills are also being used for nonferrous metals, specialty steels and other carbon products. IPSCO's sheet business has been growing and Mr. Wilson indicated further expansion is planned.

"We have plans on the books to put in a slab caster," he said. "We are looking at a strip caster."

IPSCO's Steckel mill and six or seven others were built by Tippins Machinery Co. of Pittsburgh. "Tippins has built more Steckel mills than anybody in the world," said George Tippins, president of the company.

Because of a great amount of upgrading, Mr. Tippins indicated, the old image of the Steckel mill no longer fits. "We have overcome the rodquality problem," he said.

Assuming the hot reversing mill can match the quality of the continuous mill, you would still need a cold rolling complex to make the full range of sheet product. This would get into massive costs and quantities.

Initially, therefore, a mini-sheet mill would be restricted to hot rolled products and probably a limited range of applications. Part of Nucor's interest stems from the fact that the company has a ready made application in its decking products.

PLATE MILLS

Two intriguing projects were recently announced. One covered the formation of Tuscaloosa Steel Corp. in Tuscaloosa, Ala. The new company will produce plate and other flat rolled products.

A key element in the project will be a 112-inch wide, coiled plate mill from Tippins Machinery. There have been reports that Tippins will have an equity interest in the company, but no confirmation has come from Tippins.

Because of Tippins' prominence in the Steckel mill field, it is assumed that some variation of this design will be used; no technical details have been released.

"We have a patent applied for on this new technology," said George Tippins. "It will bring economies to the manufacture of plate. It is a breakthrough."

He indicated that Tuscaloosa's plans called for putting in an electric furnace shop and a continuous caster—"hopefully, as soon as possible."

The project that has really confounded a lot of people is a proposed $165-million plate mill in the Cleveland area. One puzzling aspect is that the mill was designed by Ronald M. Lowy, a research associate at Case Western Reserve University. Mr. Lowy has had little or no steelmaking experience.

Mildly surprising is the project's support by United Steelworkers of America (USWA). The Steelworkers opposed a new Cleveland bar mill about a year earlier.

Most of the equipment and financing for the plant was scheduled to come from Industrias Villares S.A. of Brazil. This was a source of unhappiness to domestic mill builders.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. GAYDOS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks and to insert extraneous material in the RECORD on the subject of this special order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. PASHAYAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my special order be taken out of turn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

THE ARMENIAN GENOCIDE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. PASHAYAN] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. PASHAYAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. MOORHEAD].

No statement assigning responsibility for the genocide of the Armenian people can detract or add to the horrible nature of the events themselves, but to diminish in any way the events of 1915 and succeeding years is a great injustice in itself and a great disservice to the memories of those who were killed and to their survivors and descendants.

We recognize April 24 as the National Day of Remembrance of Man's Inhumanity to Man so that we may pause and reflect upon the Armenian experience. This day also serves to remind us that in modern times acts of barbarism have continued to go unchecked. It is appalling that many such acts have taken place in the 20th century. We are asked to commemorate this day so that it serves as a warning signal against other similar atrocities. No act of human destruction of such great magnitude can be prevented if we permit it to be forgotten. That is why to say "what's done is done" is wrong.

The purpose of this special order is to recall and recognize the horrible nature of such a crime against humanity. Silence may very well set the stage for repetition and will lull our senses into indifference. We are morally obligated to insure against this happening.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the gentleman from California [Mr. PASHAYAN] for taking this special order commemorating the Armenian martyrs who, 70 years ago, were slaughtered in one of the world's worst acts of terrorism and genocide. Sadly, this is not a pleasant undertaking for this body because in recalling the Armenian massacre we are reminded of some of the darkest moments in history and that the suffering and conflict created by those horrible events remain a very real experience for those affected by it.

Too often when we think of genocide we think of the millions of Jews and other people of Central and Eastern Europe who perished under Hitler's final solution. We also think of other horrible acts committed against people in Southeast Asia, Africa, and other places around the world.

Today we are asked by the Armenian community to commemorate the event as a reminder that one-half of all Armenians alive at the time were murdered in the genocide. Those who survived were forced to abandon their historic homeland and were scattered over six continents. We are engaged in this exercise to insure that the events of 70 years ago are never forgotten.

Mr. PASHAYAN. Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague, the gentleman from California, who has been a very good friend of the Armenian-American community, and if he has any further words to add, we would be glad to hear them.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I think one thing is important for us to remember in this connection. During the terrible days in Germany when Hitler first began his campaign to extinguish all those people who disagreed with him, especially the people of Jewish faith, but many, many others throughout Europe who were a threat to his type of government, his tyranny, he was asked why he tried to get by with such a horrible thing. His remark was, "Well, no one ever remembered the Armenian massacre. That has been long forgotten and this will be forgotten also."

We must make sure that none of the atrocities of this kind, the Armenian massacre, the massacre in Germany, the behavior in Cambodia, in which over half their people have been killed, these are things too horrible for us to forget as human beings. We must constantly remind ourselves that we must set up barriers so that this kind of activity will not happen to other parts of the world. It could even come to our own area years down the line if we are not always remembering that this is a thing that could happen to us and that we must guard against.

Mr. PASHAYAN. I take it my colleague agrees with me when I say that the affirmation by the United States that the genocide of the Armenian people at the hands of the Ottoman Turkish Government is a historical fact does not jeopardize the security of the United States in any way.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I do not think that any people alive today that have never been involved in such things need to worry about us remembering things that have happened in the past. We have to learn by history or we have to suffer the consequence of not learning by history. These are things that have happened. There have been all kinds of atrocities in many countries. This is one that I do not see how it could affect national defense. It is aimed at those people personally who did this horrible thing and not by people perhaps who are alive in the world today; but it did happen, I am certain, because I have known people in my lifetime who watched their families being killed and were personally there at the time, so they well remember.

Mr. PASHAYAN. We have some with us today.

Well, the inexplicable thing about the position that this government and the Turkish Government takes, of course, is that none of the accusations are made toward it, but simply toward a prior government. I find that rather uncivilized behavior on the part of the Government of Turkey. I take it my colleague agrees.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I agree and I want to congratulate the gentleman again for taking this special order.

Mr. PASHAYAN. Mr. Speaker, today marks the 70th anniversary of the first genocide of the 20th century. It was the first—and to the world's horror not the last—time a nation-state decided to solve a minority question by attempting to eliminate a minority population. Seventy years ago today, the Young Turk Government of the Ottoman Empire exiled or murdered some 200 Armenian religious, political, and intellectual leaders of Constantinople. Thus began the government-conceived systematic massacre of some 1½ million Armenian men, women, and children, and the destruction of their civilization of 2,500 years and the banishment from their historic homeland in the Anatolian Plateau.

For the past 16 years, this body has set aside a special day to commemorate Armenian Martyr's Day and it is once again my privilege to reserve this time so that we might pause to remember this tenacious people and the tragedy that befell them. By accurately remembering and truly comprehending such crimes against humanity, it is my fervent hope that we shall one day prevent forever for all peoples the horrors visited upon the Armenian people.

The twentieth century must be the time when civilized people and nations confront and eliminate the crime of genocide. We are here today to further this goal—to face history squarely, and then to act upon the knowledge gained from that painful confrontation. Past must not be prolog when in reference to crimes against humanity.

It is for these reasons alone that during the month of April each year, Armenians throughout the world bear witness, sharing their trauma and rebirth with their fellow citizens. And it is for these reasons alone that I joined my colleagues Mr. COELHO, Mr. CONTE, Mr. DORNAN, and Mr. ASPIN in introducing House Joint Resolution 192 to designate April 24, 1985, as a day of remembrance of man's inhumanity to man—a day to commemorate all victims so that there will be no more victims.

I must observe with dismay, as I did during last year's commemoration, that every effort is being made to prevent this body from joining with the Armenian-American community in commemorating the first crime of genocide in the twentieth century. Inexplicably, the Republic of Turkey adamantly denies the undeniable—that a predecessor government planned and committed the heinous crime. It is now apparent that the Turkish Government has concluded that it is a matter of the highest priority to insist that the United States join in the denial. From the statements of the Turkish Ambassador to the United States, Sukru Eledag, and the reliable reports from the press and the administration's sources, on the recent visit by Prime Minister Turgut Ozal, we know that the Republic of Turkey has indicated that it will not countenance United States commemoration of the Armenian Genocide. We have been advised that commemoration by either the Executive or Congress would cause irreparable harm to United States-Turkish relations, may effect our mutual security interests, and may even jeopardize the lives of Americans in Turkey. Mr. Speaker, every Member of this body must characterize Turkish conduct on this matter for what it is: threatening. The Turkish Government's actions are inexcusable and must be rebuffed. Aware of the growing Turkish campaign to expunge history in this country, both Armenian and American, I joined my colleagues in an effort to communicate with Prime Minister Ozal to urge that his Government not misunderstand the intent of Congress.

The letter follows:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., April 1, 1985.

His Excellency TURGUT OZAL,
Prime Minister of the Turkish Republic, Embassy of Turkey, Washington, DC.

DEAR PRIME MINISTER OZAL: We note with considerable concern that your government continues the policy of urging that the United States refrain from any recognition or remembrance of the Armenian Genocide. We sincerely regret that you continue to misinterpret the clear intent of Congress in commemorating the Armenian Genocide and that you have failed to acknowledge the consistent record of the United States in recognition of this historical fact.

There is ample, reliable, and unbiased documentary evidence from the archives of Ottoman Turkey's friends and foes alike detailing the attempted annihilation and displacement of the Armenian people. The same archival material conclusively identified the central role of the Young Turk government in the planning and execution of what U.S. Ambassador Morgenthau referred to as "a campaign of race extermination".

The Armenian Genocide is a historical fact. To deny that fact is to deny also the unprecedented assistance extended by the United States in an attempt to end the carnage and to aid those who survived. Recalling these facts does not, under any reasonable interpretation, imply disregard for Turkish lives lost today. We deplore, as you do, acts of terrorism against Turkish officials and condemn the use of violence in international affairs.

However, our mutual abhorrence of terrorism and our common security interests cannot be invoked by your government to justify denial of American and Armenian history. The unambiguous record of the Armenian Genocide and contemporary reaffirmations by President Reagan, former President Carter, the Senate, the House of Representatives, and the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Council, are realities based on an objective review of the subject.

We urge your government to reassess its position on the Armenian Genocide. The first step in this process must be an acceptance by your government that the United States has recognized and will ultimately reaffirm its historic position on this matter.

Sincerely,

CARL LEVIN.
TONY COELHO.
CHARLES PASHAYAN, JR.
ALAN CRANSTON.
ALFONSE M. D'AMATO.

As was the case in a prior letter to Ambassador Elekdag signed by 49 of my colleagues, there has been no response from the Government of Turkey. I must conclude, therefore, that the policy of the Turkish Government is to ignore those of us who seek to establish and clarify the right of the United States to reaffirm its position on the Armenian genocide. It is also apparent that the Government of Turkey has concluded all it needs to do to succeed in its effort to bury the past is to add to its list of consequences if the United States shall not comply and at some point, that the United States will capitulate. Mr. Speaker, we cannot allow those who advance this cynical and shallow assessment of United States-Turkish relations and, more importantly, the integrity of this Nation's institutions to be proven correct.

I am compelled to reproach those officials within the Reagan Administration who have uncritically advanced the Turkish position, who have stated publicly that the commemoration of the Armenian genocide is somehow against the national interest, and who have convinced the President himself to oppose adoption of House Joint Resolution 192 and a similar resolution in the other body, Senate Joint Resolution 101. I am deeply concerned that the President's advisors chose a so-called strategic course of action that cannot succeed instead of rejecting Turkish requests on the President's clearly stated recognition of the Armenian genocide, as enunciated in Proclamation 4838 of April 22, 1981. And I am disappointed that the President's advisors appear to value the needs of other nations, however incorrect, over the need to remain faithful to principles enunciated publicly by the President they serve.

For the benefit of President Reagan's advisors, I repeat the relevant portion of his proclamation on this matter:

* * * like the genocide of the Armenians before it, and the genocide of the Cambodians which followed it—and like too many other such persecutions of too many other peoples—the lessons of the Holocaust must never be forgotten.

For the benefit of President Reagan's advisors, I wish to quote U.S. Holocaust Council Chairman Elie Wiesel from his remarks of April 18 in accepting the Congressional Gold Medal regarding the ill-conceived Presidential visit to Bitburg:

Oh we know there are political and strategic reasons. But this issue, as all issues related to that awesome event, transcends politics and diplomacy. This issue here is not politics, but good and evil. And we must never confuse them.

For the benefit of President Reagan's advisors, I insert for the RECORD the April 18, 1985, editorial from the Boston Globe:

And finally, for the benefits of President Reagan's advisors, I insert for the RECORD a letter from the Armenian Assembly of America to the President dated April 18, 1985:

The editorial and letter follow:

[From the Boston Globe, April 18, 1985]

ARMENIA, HISTORY AND GUILT

President Reagan shocked many Americans with his explanation of why he thought he should not visit Dachau during his trip to Germany in May. The President said the German people have "a guilt feeling that's been imposed upon them, and I just think it's unnecessary." He intimated that Americans are wrong to expect German guilt for the Holocaust; that Germans themselves feel no guilt; or that there was never anything for anyone to be guilty of.

The President displayed a similar confusion about the history and morality earlier this month, before the visit of Turkey's prime minister. The White House released the text of a statement Reagan made to a Turkish interviewer in which he dissociated his Administration from a unanimous congressional resolution commemorating April 24th, the 70th anniversary of the Armenian genocide, as a National Day of Remembrance of Man's Inhumanity to Man.

The Turkish slaughter of 1,500,000 Armenians from 1915 to 1918 was a ghastly crime against humanity, the great precedent for 20th-century genocide. "Who still talks nowadays of the extermination of the Armenians?" was the rhetorical question Hitler posed to his top commanders on Aug. 22, 1939, as they prepared for the invasion of Poland.

This week, in response to public dismay, Reagan changed his mind and decided to make a symbolic visit to a concentration camp site. Generosity requires that Americans assume their President merely became confused and misspoke when he made his strange remarks about the imposition of guilt.

In his remarks to the Turkish interviewer, Reagan said: "I sympathize with all those who suffered during the tragic events of 1915. I also profoundly regret that Turks and Armenians have so far not been able to resolve their differences." This was a way of saying he would not contradict Turkey's official denial that the Armenian Genocide even took place. He then said that he opposed the congressional resolution because it "might inadvertently encourage or reward terrorist attacks on Turks and Turkish-Americans" and because it "could harm relations with an important ally."

The world can only deplore the insane acts of a few Armenian terrorists. They harm the just cause of the Armenian people. Nevertheless, Reagan violates logic when he pretends that the existence of Armenian terrorists constitutes a reason for rejecting the resolution.

Testifying against the resolution in February. Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger asserted that "such resolutions are counterproductive in that they serve to encourage Armenian terrorists." Like the President, Weinberger revealed his true motive when he said, "This resolution would embarrass the United States and strain relations with this critical ally (Turkey)."

For reasons of State, Weinberger and Reagan have distorted history and offended the victims of genocide. The American people owe an apology to Armenians for the callousness of American officials.

ARMENIAN ASSEMBLY OF AMERICA,
Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: The Armenian assembly of America deeply regrets your decision to oppose Congressional commemoration of the Armenian Genocide and rejects unequivocally the counsel you have received on this matter. We maintain that the redemptive and preventive value of remembering past instances of genocide far outweigh considerations of embarrassment to present governments. We further maintain that responding favorably to Turkish intimidation is beneath the dignity of this nation and sets a dangerous precedent for future nations who perceive that their histories also require modification.

The Armenian Assembly of America notes that your carefully worded statement of March 29, 1985, does not deny the historical fact of the Armenian Genocide which is based to a great extent on the extensive record compiled by the American diplomatic structure and relief missionary network. It would be difficult for you to do so in view of your statement of February, 1980, and your Proclamation 4838 of April 1981, clearly recognizing the validity and contemporary relevance of the Armenian tragedy.

You have succumbed to your advisors who have themselves been lobbied heavily by the Turkish government, its diplomatic representatives and hired lobbyists. They maintain that commemoration of the Armenian Genocide by either the Executive or Congress would cause irreparable harm to U.S./Turkish relations, might jeopardize the lives of Americans in Turkey, would lead to a denial of military facilities and intelligence listening posts, and might threaten the very existence of the present Turkish government.

The Armenian Assembly of America does not believe that the United States should or needs to accept this kind of pressure by a country that describes itself as this country's strongest NATO ally. We do not believe that the security interests of Turkey, its commitment to NATO, and its economic relations with the United States are so shallow or fragile that a commemorative acknowledgment by the United States would risk all. Nor do we believe that a government which claims to have made substantial progress towards democracy and economic recovery is so weak that it will collapse if it faces its country's past with honesty and perspective.

The announcement to oppose Congressional commemoration is an affront to the nearly one million Americans of Armenian descent who on April 24 of this year will solemnly and peacefully remember the 70th anniversary of the Armenian Genocide and who will also remember with considerable pride the leading role of the United States in attempting to end the carnage and to aid those who survived. On the basis of your public statements in recognition of this tragic event in history, we urge you to join us on April 24 as so many of this Nation's leaders have done in the past.

Sincerely,

ROSS VARTIAN,
Executive Director.

Mr. Speaker, the President has been ill-served by his subordinates. The actions of the Reagan Administration on the scheduled visit to Bitburg and the opposition to resolutions commemorating the Armenian Genocide clearly do not reflect the stated views and the obvious intent of the President in urging that the lessons of the Holocaust, Armenian Genocide and Cambodian Genocide "must never be forgotten. I urge the President to reject such advice now and in the future. I urge the President to join with Congress in commemorating the Armenian Genocide, and to encourage all Americans to seek the lessons from the Cambodian Genocide. We are compelled to join with those survivors and descendants of survivors who are aware of their obligation to humanity to bear witness. And we are compelled to oppose those who seek to prevent us from doing so.

I commend to this body the commentary on the Armenian Genocide by Walter Reich in the Los Angeles Times of November 16, 1983, when he stated:

We can't afford to forget it because it can happen again. Not to the Armenians, because they're nearly all out of Turkey—out of the part of it that the Turks thought they wanted for themselves. But it can happen wherever a minority is unwanted and it suits the majority to hate it and remove it. It's for this reason that we must insist without violence that Turks remember their history and acknowledge it. And in doing so they will learn from it, help us learn from it—at last free themselves of it.

I should point out in conclusion that the Governor of California the Honorable George Deukmejian has joined in our efforts to "affirm the historical truth." His letter of April 22, 1985, follows:

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, GOVERNOR'S OFFICE,
Sacramento, April 22, 1985.

The Honorable RONALD REAGAN,
President, The White House, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT:

Throughout your career in public service, you have distinguished yourself as one of America's most ardent and eloquent champions of freedom, democracy, and human dignity worldwide. From our many years of friendship, I know first-hand the great depth of your feelings and concern for the innocent victims of violence, totalitarianism and genocide.

As an Armenian-American, I have also been greatly appreciative of your sensitivity to the tragic events of the early 20th century which cost the lives of 1.5 million Armenians. I recall that as Governor of California, you spoke with great conviction at ceremonies commemorating the Armenian genocide. As a candidate for President in 1980, you issued a thoughtful statement which said, in part, "65 years ago, one of the greatest tragedies in the annals of recorded history occurred when one and a half million innocent Armenian men, women and children were massacred in the shadow of Mt. Ararat. I join with the Armenian-American community in solemn remembrance of the martyrs of 1915."

Most recently, in a December 1983 meeting in the Oval Office, you told me and the assembled representatives of the Armenian-American community about your personal knowledge of the Armenian genocide and your great sorrow for the Armenian people.

Mr. President, Armenian-Americans have appreciated your expressions of understanding and concern about the fate of our families and ancestors. That is why we are disappointed and disturbed by your recent response to a question posed by the Turkish newspaper Hurriyet and by your administration's continued opposition to congressional efforts to recognize April 24 as a National Day of Remembrance for all victims of genocide, including the Armenians who were massacred by the Ottoman Turks beginning in 1915.

This dark episode in human history is an indisputable historical fact. There is nothing ambiguous about it. Henry Morganthau, America's ambassador to Turkey from 1913-1916, saw the tragedy unfold before his own eyes and he reported it to President Woodrow Wilson. Adolph Hitler would later refer to the Armenian genocide as evidence that he too could escape the judgment of history for his heinous deeds. Even Ataturk, the founder of modern day Turkey, acknowledged it when he said, "These left-overs from the former young Turkey party • • • should have been made to account for the lives of millions of our Christian subjects who were ruthlessly driven enmasse from their homes and massacred."

We recognize that Turkey is a military ally of the United States. However, a mature society should be able to acknowledge its past mistakes. America has admitted that she was grievously wrong to have once supported a system of slavery. The Government and the people of West Germany have expressed great remorse for their past support of Adolph Hitler and the Nazi system that perpetrated the horrors of the Holocaust.

Similarly, I believe that Turkey should acknowledge its role in the Armenian genocide. But whether it does or not, Turkey has no justification for trying to impose its own version of history on the United States by suggesting that our bilateral relationship would be damaged should Congress or the Administration act to commemorate this tragedy.

Equally unjustifiable is the suggestion that a National Day of Remembrance for genocide victims would, in any way, encourage or reward terrorist attacks on Turks and Turkish Americans. Armenians are peaceful, law-abiding people who totally reject and deplore the violent acts of a handful of terrorists. Honoring the memory of genocide victims would not be a victory for violence in any way. It would be a simple, eloquent statement against violence and terror by heeding the painful lessons of the past.

Mr. President, I'm sure you know the depth of my support for your efforts to lead our Nation. Rather than sit silently on the sidelines, I have tried to be supportive and helpful on many of the challenging issues facing our country and your Administration. I do not regret doing so because I believe that the overwhelming majority of your policies are in the best interest of our nation. On this issue, however, I am in disagreement with both your policy and your recent statements. I hope this letter adequately expresses my sincere reasons for this disagreement.

I pray that you will reconsider your current position and take action to affirm the historical truth, as you have stated it in the past, by issuing a public statement and by instructing the State Department and the Department of Defense to support the pending congressional resolutions.

Please accept my very best wishes to you and Nancy.

Most cordially,

GEORGE DEUKMEJIAN.

● Mr. COELHO. Mr. Speaker, I take great pride today in joining my colleagues in commemorating the genocide of approximately 1.5 million Armenians by the Turkish Government 70 years ago today. We take this opportunity to pay tribute to those who sacrificed their lives while reflecting on the many contributions which the Armenian people have made to this country.

It is unfortunate that there are still those, including the Turkish Government, who prefer that this grave blemish in their national policy be overlooked and that history be rewritten in a fashion that would ignore the ruthless destruction of lives and property that continues to this day as an international example of man's inhumanity to man. This shameful occurrence cannot be forgotten by those who continue to bear the scars of the genocide, nor should it be by civilized nations around the globe.

The Armenian genocide is a fact and is well-documented. We cannot let the efforts by those who wish to deny the truth to obscure the purpose of the commemoration of this day. Not only the Armenian people who reside in my congressional district, but those throughout the Nation, have become interwoven in the fabric of our society while retaining their own special heritage through their language, their religion and their ethnic customs. By so doing, in virtually every field of endeavor, the Armenian people have excelled and greatly enriched our national cultural heritage.

It is important that we remember the tragedy of this genocide in order to prevent it from ever happening again.●

● Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, I rise to join my distinguished colleague, Hon. CHARLES PASHAYAN, JR., of the 17th District of California, in commemorating Armenian Martyrs Day.

Since my election to the Congress of the United States in 1964, I have each year without fail for 21 years taken the floor of the House of Representatives to mark the anniversary of the Turkish massacre of the Armenian people which took place 70 years ago.

As the years have passed, the numbers of those who have survived the massacre have dwindled, but the events that those survivors have related to us remain vividly in our hearts and in our minds. This year an unprecedented amount of pressure has been brought to bear by the current Turkish Government on Members of Congress to disregard this more-than-amply documented event in world history.

But no amount of pressure can deter my steadfast colleagues who rise today to express their support for House Joint Resolution 192, designating April 24 as a "National Day of Remembrance of Man's Inhumanity to Man," and to pay homage to those courageous Armenians who perished in the Armenian genocide when more than 1.5 million Armenians were exterminated, and 3,000 years of the Armenian presence in their historic homeland was virtually eliminated.

Recalling in modern times the acts of barbarism which have occurred in the past is one means of insuring that such outrageous crimes against humanity are not repeated. With this intent, the 40th anniversary of the Days of Remembrance of the victims of the Holocaust took place last week in this Chamber when we honored the memory of those Jews who perished at the hands of the Nazis in World War II. In addition to the Jewish genocide by the Nazis, the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Council unanimously included in a place of prominence in the Holocaust Memorial Museum the Armenian genocide by the Ottoman Turks.

History cannot be denied. It is public knowledge that our own State Department has irrefutable evidence in its own files of the Armenian genocide, along with Ambassador Henry Morgenthau's eye-witness reports which were cabled to our State Department at the time of the genocide.

The current Turkish Government is not being blamed for what happened 70 years ago during the tenure of another Turkish Government. Likewise the German Government today is not being blamed for what happened during the Nazi reign of Germany 40 years ago. Unlike the German Government, however, the current Turkish Government refuses to acknowledge the documented historical facts of the Armenian Genocide.

The time is long overdue for a dialogue to begin. In order to heal the wounds of the past, it is first necessary to acknowledge that they exist. In this regard, I urge that the current Turkish Government follow the example set by the current Government of the Republic of Germany, for only in so doing can the world be made safe from future atrocities against mankind.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out that the descendants of those few who survived have to this day borne the horrors and scars left from the genocide, and seven decades after this crime against their forefathers, those of Armenian descent in the world today are continuing their fight for recognition, redemption, and justice.

As a Member of Congress who has a large Armenian-American constituency in my 11th Congressional District of Illinois and as a cosponsor of House Joint Resolution 192, I join my colleagues in commemorating this tragic event in world history, and in paying tribute to the memory and the martyrdom of the innocent victims of the Armenian genocide.●

● Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join my colleagues in this special order commemorating Armenian Martyrs Day.

It was 70 years ago today that the world's first genocide of a Christian people began. During the years from 1915 to 1923 over 2 million Armenian citizens were systematically driven from their homeland of 3,000 years. The Armenians living under the domain of the Ottoman Empire were deported and sent to slave-labor camps. Many perished there, while others survived only long enough to be massacred by the thousands as the world looked on. By recognizing this important date, we acknowledge the pain and suffering of the men, women and children who died for no other reason than the fact they were Armenians. In remembering those who perished in the Armenian genocide, we reaffirm our dedication to the principles of personal and religious freedom, and our commitment to promoting peace and liberty throughout the world.

As citizens of a nation founded on these principles we are obligated to take notice of their violation, wherever those violations may occur and regardless of who might commit them. The Armenian genocide is a historical fact. To deny that fact is to deny the wealth of evidence supporting it. After 70 years, and additional documentation of those terrible events, the Turkish Government refuses to even acknowledge what its predecessor government did. We cannot and shall not accept these distortions of history that deny the humanity of the Armenians who perished. I believe the conclusion we should draw is clear; our obligation is to learn the truth about these events, record them in our history and never forget them. This is the least we can do to honor the memory of the victims, and to prevent future Holocausts from occurring.●

● Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Speaker, I am honored to add my voice to those of my colleagues participating in tonight's special order to commemorate the 70th anniversary of the Armenian genocide. I am a cosponsor of House Joint Resolution 192 which would recognize this date as a national day of remembrance for the victims of the genocide of 1915. It is unspeakable that some are actually attempting to convince the world that the genocide against the Armenian people by the Turks never took place. The American Ambassador in Turkey at the time of the massacre of over 1,500,000 Armenians provided one of the most authoritative and heart-wrenching accounts.

Agencies of the U.S. Government played a humanitarian role in attempting to end the murderous campaign against unarmed Armenian men, women, and children by the Turks, and by providing aid to those who survived the slaughter. It is a disgrace that the administration has seen fit to oppose enactment of this year's House and Senate Armenian genocide commemorative resolutions. It is also a travesty that the historical fact of the genocide of 1915 is being questioned, and that its proponents are somehow being characterized as being in league with terrorists. The Armenian-American community has repeatedly and vehemently condemned terrorists who claim to be fighting for vengeance of the 1915 genocide. The Armenian-American community has made significant contributions to our country's advancement. They have a proud heritage, and a great culture to pass on to their children.●

● Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Speaker, each year at this time we acknowledge and remember the first genocide of the 20th century. Seventy years ago, on April 24, 1915, the Ottoman Empire began the systematic slaughter of 1½ million Armenians.

Our obligation here is not to merely note the outrageous, inhuman, brutal behavior of the Ottoman Turkish regime, but to commemorate an event that was largely ignored by the world while it was occurring. This is a crime of conscience beyond any simple error of omission, to ignore or forget the mass killing of an entire people.

The Armenian-Americans who are our friends and neighbors today are the survivors of this merciless killing. They serve to remind us constantly of the cruelty of which man is capable, and help us to defend against the recurrence of such an event.

Many Armenians suffered and died needlessly and the cruelty they endured must never be repeated. This tragedy occured and we cannot now erase it, but the horror of the years from 1915 to 1922 which touches our hearts again today compels us to protect our future from the recurrence of such a nightmare.●

● Mr. BERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to commemorate the 1.5 million Armenians who were the victims of the first genocide of the 20th century.

From 1915 through 1923 the Armenian people were singled out for extinction and systematically massacred by the Ottoman Turkish Government. Deportation and murder of Armenians were official policy. In their desire to wipe out both the Armenian nation and its ancient culture, the Turks effectively eliminated almost the entire Armenian community of Asia Minor and Turkish Armenia. Some 2.5 million Armenians inhabited the Ottoman empire at the beginning of World War I. Approximately 500,000 escaped to Russia, the United States, Europe, and Arab countries. Today less that 100,000 Armenians live in Turkey.

The U.S. State Department, the American Ambassador to Turkey, and the American media condemned and documented the horror as it occured. In recent years, U.S. Presidents and both Chambers of Congress have recognized the Armenian genocide of 1915. Yet today, it remains a source of concern to all who recognize the vital importance of remembering, that Turkey refuses to acknowledge the brutal annihilation of a people. We do not seek to blame the present Government founded under the Turkish Constitution of 1923. We seek to convince the Turkish authorities and the rest of the world of the importance of recognizing the responsibility and the reality of the genocide. To forget or to underestimate the magnitude is to run the risk of repetition.

Recent terrorist attacks under the supposed justification of revenge for past mass-murder are a deplorable manner in which to call attention to the events of 1915. The murder of innocent civilians is a terrible way to commemorate genocide. The United States should never take action to promote terrorism anywhere in the world. I have worked consistently to strengthen our Nation's curbs on terrorism.

If extremists claim that the world does not recognize the facts of the Armenian tragedy, the official recognition of the genocide shows how wrong they are. We recognize the evil—we remember it, and we seek to prevent its repetition. We deplore the violent acts of a few extremists who taint the memory we are trying to preserve.●

● Mrs. BURTON of California. Mr. Speaker, I join my colleagues today in observing the 70th anniversary of the Armenian genocide. By doing so, we seek to ensure that the horror of this crime remains fresh in the minds of all men and women so that such a tragedy will never occur again.

I am deeply troubled by the attempts of some to deny the Armenian genocide. Some say that by recognizing this tragedy, we might insult the Government of Turkey. I don't agree with that reasoning. The United States has admitted its past mistakes for once supporting a system of slavery. The current West German Government has expressed its deep regrets that one of their past leaders committed such horrible atrocities against the Jews. There is no implication of guilt of the current Turkish Government by our recognizing the Armenian genocide.

The Armenian genocide is a historical fact. The evidence is in our possession in the U.S. archives. If we will not recognize the Armenian genocide, how will we ever convince the Turkish Government to do so?

I join with my colleagues in commemorating this dark day. Let us rededicate ourselves to a future where such a tragedy will not occur again and let us not forget the millions who gave their lives for their faith and love of freedom.●

● Mr. MATSUI. Mr. Speaker, today, April 24, 1985 marks the 70th anniversary of the brutal massacre by the Ottoman Empire Turks of its Armenian population. The systematic persecution of 1.5 million innocent Armenians was the first genocide of the 20th century.

I wholeheartedly support my colleagues' proposals to designate this day as a "National Day of Remembrance" to honor all genocide victims. It is important for those of us who cherish freedom and who abhor the crime that was committed, to stand together in tribute and recognition of the men, women and children whose lives were lost.

I am appalled that President Reagan has gone on record as opposing a National Day of Remembrance. His reasoning, that to do so would encourage terrorist attacks on Turks and Armenians, represents the same insensitivity and misguided judgment that has him laying a wreath at the graves of waffen SS troops in Bitburg, Germany next month. Since when do we allow terrorists to hold hostage our Nation's window on history?

In plotting the second genocide of the 20th century, Hitler asked rhetorically, "who remembers the extermination of the Armenians?" It is up to us, the free people of the world, to remember and to remind others.●

● Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Speaker, I rise to join my colleagues in marking April 24, the 70th anniversary of the Armenian genocide, as a "National Day of Rememberance of Man's Inhumanity to Man."

Coming as it does, only a week after the Days of Rememberance for the victims of the Nazi Holocaust, we are reminded of how often in this century, genocide has been perpetrated.

I deeply regret the President's decision to disassociate himself and his administration from this day of commemoration for the 1.5 million Armenians who were murdered between 1915 and 1918. This commemoration is in no way meant as a condemnation of the present Government of Turkey. In fact, no one who bears any sort of responsibility for this crime, is even alive anymore. Today, Turkey like Germany, is a valuable ally. This should not however, prevent us or the President, from paying tribute to the victims of genocide.

It is important that as we remember the Armenian victims, we pledge that this time we truly mean "Never Again." The ugly precedent that began with 1.5 million Armenian martyrs 70 years ago, has continued, claiming millions of Jews, Biafrans, Bengalis and Cambodians along the way.

I urge the President to join us today to remember the Armenian victims and the millions of others who have perished in this century as a result of man's inhumanity to man.●

● Mr. MAVROULES. Mr. Speaker, I come before this House today to pay tribute to the millions of Armenians who suffered during the Armenian genocide from 1915 to 1923. Our reason for speaking out is not to condemn Turkey. Rather, it is to recognize the suffering that was incurred on countless innocent people and to use this historical event as an example of what we must collectively work to prevent.

On April 24, 1915, exactly 70 years ago, a genocide began in Turkey that took the lives of 1.5 million Armenians. On that day alone, about 200 Armenian religious, political, and intellectual leaders were either arrested, exiled, or murdered. For 8 long years, from 1915 to 1923, Armenians lived in fear of torture and death. Some were fortunate enough to flee the mass execution, but all Armenians suffered. More than 500,000 Armenians were exiled from their homes, and many witnessed the death and imprisonment of loved ones. The memories of such atrocities never leave, and are passed on from generation to generation.

Understandably, it is hard for most Americans to imagine such suffering. But, for a moment we must try our hardest to do so, for we can work to prevent this type of brutality from ever occurring again. As a first step, we can exact a National Day of Remembrance of Man's Inhumanity to Man. And no day is more appropriate than today—the anniversary of the arrests that led to 8 years of genocide.

Again, let me clarify one point that threatens enactment of this day of remembrance. We are not condemning Turkey. Just as when we ask the President not to forget the concentration camps of World War II we are not condemning Germany or the German people. Rather, we want the whole world to recognize genocide as unlawful and immoral.●

● Mr. LEHMAN of California. Mr. Speaker, it is an honor and privilege for me to join my colleagues in paying special tribute to the victims and survivors of the Armenian genocide on, this, the 70th anniversary of that tragic event.

As we all know, that unfortunate tragedy claimed the lives of over 1.5 million men, women, and children and forced into exile another 500,000. Their only fault was to have been of Armenian descent and lived during the oppressive reign of the Ottoman Turkish empire at the turn of this century.

Documented by notable historians and records of the U.S. Government, it is time that the devastation to the Armenians be recognized as an historic event so that memory of genocide can be finally placed in its proper perspective.

It is unfortunate that the House of Representatives has met with such difficulty and resistance in passing a resolution which would commemorate the Armenian genocide and the other genocides in history. Those of us who are sharing in this special tribute today, realize the need and importance of recognizing man's inhumanity to man and should use the 70th anniversary of the Armenian genocide as a reaffirmation of our support to pass House Joint Resolution 192, which would establish such a commemorative day.

Mr. Speaker, I have the distinct honor of representing a large community of Americans of Armenian descent—a community which has made many important contributions to the arts and sciences of our society. My many friends in the San Joaquin Valley Armenian community are proud of their heritage and the traditions of the Armenian culture, and I am equally proud to serve as their representative in this body and have the opportunity to speak on their behalf.

To pay recognition and tribute to them and the thousands of other Armenians throughout the Nation by continuing our efforts to establish a permanent day of commemoration to the Armenian genocide is a worthy and just cause.

However, to associate the terrorists acts of a few with the noteworthy contributions of generations of Armenian Americans and Armenians throughout the world is a serious injustice and affront.

And to deny the Armenian community of this symbolic gesture of recognizing the atrocities of 70 years ago on the grounds that it would jeopardize U.S. relations with modern Turkey is an indignity to both Armenians and Turks.

The Armenian genocide, commonly referred to as the first genocide of the 20th century, as with genocides which followed, was an atrocity which should be recognized by all mankind—recognized for the horror and misery which it inflicted and as a reminder that genocides should have no place in our future.

Appropriate recognition of this tragedy would be a fitting tribute to the victims and families of the survivors. I salute my friends in the Armenian community and join my colleagues in paying appropriate tribute to all of the victims of the Armenian genocide.●

● Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, today this body commemorates the Armenian genocide, a tradition we began in 1964. Seventy years have passed since this terrible crime against humanity took place, an event which is commemorated in ceremonies throughout this country and the world. I am deeply saddened to find that there are people who would have us forget this tragedy. I do not believe in collective guilt, in the idea that the sins of the fathers are visited on the sons. I do believe, however, that it is only by a conscious act of memory that we can prevent a recurrence of such horrifying event.

I would like to enter into the RECORD a letter I received from His Excellency, the Turkish Ambassador Sukru Elekdag, and my response to him.

The letter follows:

TURKISH EMBASSY,
Washington, DC, March 21, 1985.

BARNEY FRANK,
House of Representatives,
Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. FRANK: It is my understanding that you are being asked to lend your name and support to two resolutions which, although seemingly innocuous, would be seized upon as encouragement for international terrorists allied with those who just a few days ago, on March 12, killed a Canadian security guard while storming the residence of the Turkish ambassador to Canada in Ottawa.

I refer to H.J. Res. 37 and H.J. Res. 192 which would designate April 24, 1985, as a "National Day of Remembrance of Man's Inhumanity to Man" and which embrace claims that Armenians were the victims of genocide in Turkey 70 years ago—the stated pretext for the Ottawa terrorist attack.

Passage would be a severe setback to our common efforts to stamp our international terrorism. I hope your consideration of the effects of passage of these resolutions will lead you to withhold your support.

The March 12 attack by terrorists calling themselves members of the "Armenian Revolutionary Army" (ARA) resulted in the death of a Canadian, severe injury to Ambassador Coskun Kirca, and hours of terror to his wife and daughter and 10 other persons held hostage until rescued by Canadian authorities. It was the latest incident in an 11-year rampage of assassins claiming membership in Armenian terrorist organizations, in which they have murdered 41 Turkish diplomats and members of their families and some 30 innocent bystanders, including Americans. Several attacks have occurred here in the United States.

The Ottawa murderers echoed the pretext of their fellow terrorists that this senseless shedding of innocent blood constitutes "vengeance" for what they allege was genocide practiced on Armenian subjects of the Ottoman Empire 70 years ago. A supporter interviewed on Canadian television the next day tried to cloak the raid in respectability by calling the terrorist activities "a fight for freedom . . . a just cause (with) no time limit."

Every semblance of respectability is seized upon by international terrorists as justifications for their taking of innocent human life. Seeming acceptance by the Congress of these pretexts for terrorism will be claimed by the terrorists and their supporters as a victory for their vicious campaign of bloodshed. Moreover, it will fuel the irrational hatred that permits calculating terrorist operatives to convert impressionable Armenian youths into murderers of innocents in 1985—murders in "retribution" for erroneously interpreted tragedies 70 years ago that suffering to all ethnic groups in Anatolia.

All people of good will throughout the world are gratefully aware of American abhorrence of terrorism and championship of justice and the sanctity of human life, and have joined in sympathy toward Americans who have been the innocent victims of terrorist assassins.

I sincerely hope that you and your colleagues in the Congress will refuse to allow your good will to be unintentionally distorted into a prize for those who shed the blood of innocents to publicize their "cause." I equally hope you will also take into consideration the Turkish people's extreme sensitivity and strong reaction to being slandered by Armenian activists. I look forward to our continuing common commitment to stamp out terrorism and common effort toward the safeguarding of human lives from the attacks of assassins.

Sincerely,

SUKRU ELEKDAG,
Ambassador of the Turkish Republic.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, DC, April 5, 1985.

His Excellency SUKRU ELEKDAG,
Embassy of the Republic of Turkey,
Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. AMBASSADOR: I found your letter of March 21st offensive. I deeply resent your attempt to equate support for my colleague Tony Coelho's bill condemning "Man's Inhumanity to Man" with support for terrorism. I am proud to be a cosponsor of this legislation. I have been a vocal critic of terrorism, including atrocities committed by American extremists. This does not prevent me from recognizing the legitimate historical grievances of the Armenian people.

If you are serious about international cooperation to prevent terrorism, I would strongly recommend that you refrain from such rhetoric—it only detracts from our efforts.

Thank you for your attention.

BARNEY FRANK.

When Hitler embarked on his final solution, he claimed that people's memories were short, that no one remembered the Armenian genocide. We must prove him wrong, Mr. Speaker. We do remember. We carry in our hearts the searing images of the Armenian Holocaust, as well as the Jewish Holocaust which followed.●

● Mr. LUNGREN. Mr. Speaker, as a cosponsor of House Joint Resolution 192, I rise today with a great number of my colleagues who have joined together to mark the anniversary of the million and a half Armenians who suffered so greatly at the hands of the Ottoman empire. Tragically, these individuals were put to death for no other reason than their ethnic and religious convictions.

Without question, the Armenian genocide is an affront to all decent people who value the gift of human life. Because of our moral values and commitment to human dignity, it requires us to speak out about the truth of this dark episode in our world's history.

On April 22, 1981, President Reagan stated that "the lessons of the genocide of the Armenians must never be forgotten." I strongly share the President's desire to express concern for anyone who has ever had the misfortune of being subjected to the cruelty of tyrants.

Let me be clear that the purpose of those of us who speak out for people of Armenian descent, do so not because we seek to inflame hatred, or that we desire a chill in relations with the present Government of Turkey. On the contrary, we do so because we are compelled to eliminate racial and religious hatred from our lives.

Mr. Speaker, the Armenian terrorist groups who receive front page cover for their bombing and killings of Turkish diplomats do not represent my California constituents of Armenian descent. On the contrary, the majority of the 6.5 million Armenians today do not condone terrorism in any way. Nor, however, will they ever accept any distortion of what the true historical facts are.

I commend everyone associated with this special order today, and hope this body will call for the immediate consideration of House Joint Resolution 192.●

● Mr. MORRISON of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, today we mark the 70th anniversary of the world's first genocide in the 20th century. Between 1915 and 1923, 1½ million Armenian men, women, and children were systematically massacred, and another 500,000 deported, by the Turkish Government. I urge my colleagues to join me in cosponsoring House Joint Resolution 192, to designate this day as "National Day of Rememberance of Man's Inhumanity to Man," so that we may never forget this painful episode in history.

On this day in 1915, more than 200 Armenian religious, political, and intellectual leaders were arrested in Constantinople and in Armenian centers throughout the Ottoman Empire. These pillars of the Armenian community were either deported or taken to the interior and murdered, leaving the Armenian people leaderless and setting the stage for barbaric genocide.

In May 1915, the Turks ordered the deportation of all Armenians. In the resulting death march, women, children, and the elderly wound their way across Asia Minor and Turkish Armenia into the Syrian Desert. The Turks inflicted countless gruesome atrocities upon the defenseless Armenians, including rape, drownings, and torture. The roads were strewn with Armenian bodies. Able bodied Armenian men in the armed forces were segregated into labor battalions, disarmed, and ultimately worked to death or massacred.

Henry Morgenthau, the U.S. Ambassador to Turkey from 1913 to 1916 had no doubt that the Turkish treatment of the Armenians was part of a deliberate plan of extermination. He wrote in 1918, "When the Turkish authorities gave the orders for these deportations, they were merely giving the death warrant to a whole race."

Successive Turkish governments, in an attempt to rewrite history, have tried to cover up this clear case of genocide by denying its very existence. Where this has failed, they have warned of damage to Turkish-American relations should the United States persist in reminding the world of this terrible tragedy. It shocked me to learn that President Reagan, bowing to this pressure, has rejected the idea of a day of remembrance because, in his words, it "might inadvertantly encourage or reward terrorist attacks on Turks and Turkish Americans."

The principles of truth and justice cannot and will not be held hostage to terrorism and threats. We join today to proclaim with a united voice that we shall never forget, that history cannot be rewritten, that in order to avoid atrocities in the future we must always remember the atrocities of the past.

Adolph Hitler took advantage of the world's amnesia, looking at the Armenian genocide as a precedent for his own holocaust perpetrated against European Jews. Hitler said, in a chilling remark made in 1939, "Who, after all, speaks today of the annihilation of the Armenians?"

We must speak today of the annihilation of the Armenians. We must speak today of the Holocaust. We must speak today and always against any crime committed against humanity. We must join in commemorating April 24, 1985, as a "National Day of Rememberance of Man's Inhumanity to Man."●

● Mrs. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, today April 24, 1985, commemorates the genocide of the Armenian people, a genocide planned and committed by the Ottoman government of Turkey 70 years ago. I do not plan today, to document the occurrence of the genocide. It happened. It is a fact of history. Nor do I intend to recount the excesses of that wretched period in history, for those too, are clearly detailed. Rather, I would like to reflect for a moment on what this commemoration has to do with us, as a nation.

Seventy years ago, Mr. Speaker, may seem like a long time to some people. Long enough for them to want to forget, or to ignore, or even to deny, that the Armenian genocide occurred. How convenient life must be for those people. They are to be envied for never having felt the inhuman suffering, the incomprehensible pain, of these Armenians who endured the living hell of the Anatolian desert as they were departed to their deaths. How simple to not have to go through life trying to comprehend what a genocide really is, and what it means to remember. The survivors, unfortunately, cannot forget. The memories of loved ones tortured and killed are seared onto their hearts forever. One reason we stand here today, one reason we have resolutions such as House Joint Resolution 192, to commemorate man's inhumanity to man, is to in some small way acknowledge the very private pain of those for whom forgetting is impossible.

But there is another reason, a reason that touches each and every one of us. Monsters, after all, do not create genocides. Human beings do. And they are aided by the worst villains of all; ignorance, prejudice, and indifference. I do not know of a nation that exists without these traits in at least some measure. Thus we also commemorate the Armenian genocide to remind us of the very human roots of such evils.

I would like to conclude my comments by focusing briefly on those in our Government and in the Government of Turkey, who would like to create the impression that there was no genocide. Our Founding Fathers made a pact with history to create a new nation, dedicated to truth and justice—1.5 million Armenians may seem like a small, easily missed corner of history, especially from the comfortable vantage point of 1985. But is the denial of truth ever a small, insignificant matter? What criteria shall we use to overlook history? Is it time? Numbers? Political expediency? As some now choose to ignore the calculated extermination of the Armenians, shall we soon be indifferent to the deaths of 6 million Jews? The Soviet Union does not fear rewriting history to suit political fancy. Stalin's purges of over 20 million people are still not recorded history in the Soviet Union. Is the only difference between the United States and the Soviet Union to be the extent of our deceits?

I raise these questions because as an American, and as an elected Representative to Congress, I am proud of our country's tradition of seeking to preserve the dignity of the individual, through our constitution, our laws, and our institution. But there is no dignity where there is no truth. The commemoration of the Armenian genocide, as with all genocides, reminds us of man's inhumanity to man. The acknowledgement of the genocide however, reaffirms our humanity.●

● Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, as a cosponsor of House Joint Resolution 192, designating today as "National Day of Remembrance of Man's Inhumanity to Man," I am happy to take part in this special order recognizing Armenian Martyrs' Day.

On this the 70th anniversary of the Armenian genocide, those who would forget history—if not deny it—are hard at work again. This anniversary comes at an opportune time, as our Nation is engaged in a heated debate on whether to forgive and forget the Nazi Holocaust, a debate precipitated by our President's decision to visit a German cemetery. This is not just any cemetery, but one which contains graves of the monstrous Nazi SS.

I cannot find words sufficient to convey the grave consequences of such amnesia. Indeed, it has often been said that had the world noted and remembered the Armenian Holocaust, Hitler would not have dared to proceed with his elimination of the Jews.

It is, therefore, very important that we take time out today to commemorate the memory of the 1.5 million Armenian men, women, and children whose lives were lost in the first genocide of the 20th century. And it is equally important to refuse to allow revisionists to change the facts of history. I recently had the privilege of serving as a panelist in a conference sponsored by the Armenian Center at Columbia University and by the Armenian Assembly of America. This conference was on the "Changing Perceptions of the Armenian Genocide," and I came away from the conference more convinced than ever that the Ar-

I have recently received many telegrams, as I am sure many of my colleagues have from constituents concerned about the implications of House Joint Resolution 192. "There is no need to fight World War I again," the telegrams read. "Attempts to defame Turks not in the interest of the United States. Encourages terrorism and helps Warsaw Pact nations."

These telegrams completely miss the point. The point of this resolution, the point of this special order is not to continue the fighting or to defame our NATO ally Turkey, any more than the World War II Holocaust commemorations or the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Council, of which I am a member, are attempts to fight or defame present day Germany. The point is to remember, for if we forget history and the millions who lost their lives, then that loss is made even more tragic and the chances of repeating history magnified.●

● Mr. McHUGH. Mr. Speaker, as you know, Mr. Speaker, April 24 marks the 70th anniversary of the Armenian genocide, an event which began on the evening of April 24, 1915, and ended only some years later after the deaths of more than 1 million men, women, and children. It is, therefore, appropriate to remember and honor these victims, not only to remind us of their fate but also to strengthen our resolve that never again shall such slaughters be allowed.

The tragedy that befell the Armenian people earlier this century was only a beginning, of course. As Armenians recovered from the shock of their near anihilation and deportation from their homeland, they found themselves dispersed throughout the world, largely forgotten. Soon, however, the spirit of the Armenian people revived. April 24 became a rallying point, a day of commemoration for the victims and a day of renewal for the survivors and their descendants.

Although the Armenian genocide was ignored for decades by those who had not been touched first hand, efforts to ignore a tragedy of this dimension could never succeed. Thus, in time, religious and political leaders throughout the world began to participate in the commemorative events of April 24. Their participation was a message that the world could not afford to forget the tragedy that had been perpetrated against the Armenian people.

Even today there are those who would have us ignore the Armenian genocide. Some would have us rewrite history while others would be content to have us forget history, but clearly their efforts are doomed to failure.

Mr. Speaker, it has been said that the past is prologue, prologue to the continuing stream of history. As we look back over the course of events, we must also look forward in the firm belief that by our actions we can affect future events. In looking back across the years to the tragedy that befell the Armenian people, we must look forward as well in order to prevent a repetition of their calamity. For we can draw a direct parallel between the massive genocides of this century and the savage acts of terrorism that plague us today. Both involve violence against innocent people, and both reveal an alarming contempt for human life.

By any standard the massacre of over 1 million Armenians was one of the most callous and barbarous acts ever committed. In the end, however, the continuing significance of the Armenian genocide lies not only in the physical history of the events that took place, but also in the symbolic nature of such indiscriminate slaughter.

Thus, even as we honor the victims of this genocide, we must do more. If the brutality committed against the Armenian people is to have a lasting effect, the Armenian genocide must become not only a tug on our heartstrings but a call to conscience and a call to action against terrorism around the world. In that sense, Mr. Speaker, the Armenian genocide speaks to us across the decades.●

● Mr. LEVINE of California. Mr. Speaker, I want to commend my colleague from California for reserving this time to enable us to participate in this special order commemorating Armenian Martyrs' Day. It was on this day 70 years ago that the genocide of the Armenian people began.

The Armenian genocide began with the roundup by the Ottoman Turkish Government of Armenian community intellectuals in Istanbul, who were then executed in cold blood. Before it was over, 1½ million Armenians were brutally slaughtered in a rampage that lasted for 2 years.

Although this slaughter was unprecedented in modern times, it went largely ignored by the world. Yes; there were reports of the heinous deeds being committed, but, as it seems with other systematic, mass murders, little if anything was done to stop it from happening. But it did happen, and we must not forget that it did.

The survivors of the Armenian genocide to this day suffer not only the traumatic scars of seeing their families and loved ones cruelly tortured and murdered, but they and their children suffer the indignity of having every Turkish Government deny the atrocities committed in 1915.

We have heard the word "genocide" spoken often in this Chamber, and its meaning never ceases to conjure up visions of heinous and horrific deeds. The memory of the Armenian genocide and its historical importance must be kept alive, and we must reject any attempts to bury it in the sands of history. As with all genocides, we must remember that they happened so that they will not happen again.

Thank you.●

● Mr. GALLO. Mr. Speaker, this year marks the 70th anniversary of the first genocide of the 20th century, namely the destruction of 1.5 million Armenians who perished at the hands of the Ottoman Empire. During the years 1915–23, hundreds of thousands of Armenians were massacred outright or were forced to flee their homes and died as a result of forced marches. The remainder of the Armenian people who survived, were forcibly deported and dispersed throughout the world.

At the beginning of World War I the census reports accounted for at least 2.5 million Armenians residing in Turkey. At the close of the war and still today, there are less than 100,000 remaining.

It was on April 24, 1915, that this era of massacres began when over 200 of the most revered Armenian intellectuals were rounded up in Constantinople and later killed by the Ottoman government. In the torturous years ahead, the Armenian people would be subjected to indescribable horrors.

The U.S. Ambassador to Turkey at the time of this genocide, Henry Morgenthau, was an eyewitness to these atrocities and documented them in great detail. In confidence, he stated, "the whole of the human race contains no such horrible episode as this. The great massacres and persecutions of the past seem almost insignificant when compared to the sufferings of the Armenian race in 1915."

Even though the Armenians have been scattered throughout the world, they have not forgotten their history or their heritage, nor can we. There are many Armenians now living in America who have made valuable contributions to our communities.

My friend and former colleague in the New Jersey Assembly, assistant Republican leader Garabed "Chuck" Haytaian, is here today to share with us his strength of conviction, both as an Armenian and as an American, that we must not forget these horrible events and, most importantly, that we must never allow such events to occur again.

Just a week ago, we commemorated the 40th anniversary of the liberation of the death camps, where victims of the Nazi Holocaust were slaughtered. And yet, too few people remember and understand the implications of the chilling words of Adolph Hitler, when describing his "great resettlement policy."

Hitler cited the "extermination of the Armenians" and concluded that whole "masses of men are mere biological plasticine."

If we forget these tragedies, we take the colossal risk that we will be reminded of this tragedy in the future by its repetition. We must not turn a blind eye on this inhumanity to man. The function of this day is then to commemorate the sacrifice of 1.5 million Armenian men, women, and children for no good reason.

We remember these events of the past not because we wish to punish any living persons for the events of the past. It is not our purpose to single out any race or nation for the actions of people now before the judgment of history and a higher power.

We remember these events to prevent another race or nation from committing these same acts in another place and in another time.

Raphael Lemkin, the man who coined the word "genocide" after escaping from his native Poland during the Nazi invasion, said this best. "The function of memory is not only to register past events, but to stimulate human conscience."●

● Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, today marks the 70th anniversary of the beginning of the tragic genocide that was perpetrated upon the Armenian people between 1915 and 1923. I join with my colleague CHIP PASHAYAN in his special order today with a sense of sorrow and dismay as we reflect upon this great calamity and as we pay tribute to the martyrs of the Armenian genocide.

During World War I, the Ottoman empire had suffered defeat at the hands of the Russians in northeastern Turkey. By 1915, the Ottoman authorities began fearing that Armenians would act as a fifth column within Turkey by supporting the Russians and their allies. The Ottoman government subsequently ordered a mass deportation of Armenians. The Armenian people were not only deported and robbed of their lands and possessions but they were also subjected to cold-blooded massacres and atrocities and brutal extermination.

During the 5-year span of this genocide, 1.5 million Armenians died, 500,000 were exiled and countless survivors witnessed the atrocities perpetrated upon their families, relatives, and friends. These survivors still carry with them the memory and the scars of this great tragedy. Males were separated from their families and massacred while the remaining women, children, and the elderly were forced to march across Asia Minor to the Syrian desert. Of these marchers, thousands died en route of starvation, exposure, and disease.

The most glaring aspect of this entire tragedy is the fact that the Turkish Government still continues to deny that this genocide ever occurred. The deaths of 1.5 million Armenians are explained away as a result of years of civil strife in the region. This denial of history that has been documented by survivors, eyewitnesses, and correspondents, including the American Ambassador to Turkey in 1915, Henry Morgenthau, is detrimental to our goals of preventing similar tragedies from occurring in the future. To recall this tragedy in 1915 does not mean that we condemn the current Turkish Government. It is our responsibility to preserve the memory of this tragedy and to instill in the minds of men the lesson that this tragedy has provided us.

For this reason, I have cosponsored House Joint Resolution 192, introduced by Representative TONY COELHO that would designate April 24 as a National Day of Remembrance of Man's Inhumanity to Man to call attention to the Armenian genocide of 1915.

It is only with the constant reminder of tragedies such as the Armenian genocide, the Ukrainian famine and the Jewish Holocaust that future tragedies can be averted. We owe it to not only the memories of the Armenians that lost their lives in this tragic way but also to the survivors and to future generations to continue our vigilance and ensure that this tragic chapter of the history of mankind is never again forgotten or ignored.●

● Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Speaker, traditionally this is a day when we look back at the events of 1915 and memorialize the genocide of Armenians. That is the appropriate thing to do on April 24.

This year I would like to comment on a contemporary issue, however. That issue is the growing number of attacks on the efforts of many Members of Congress to memorialize the Armenian genocide. The opposition most recently took the form of a "Dear Colleague" letter that was distributed around the House opposing House Joint Resolution 192, a resolution that seeks simply to designate April 24, 1985—the 70th anniversary of the start of the genocide of Armenians—as a "National Day of Remembrance of Man's Inhumanity to Man."

The "Dear Colleague" made three arguments for opposing the resolution:

First, it is anti-Turk and offensive to Turkish-Americans.

Second, it would hurt our ally Turkey.

Third, it could be used to justify further murders of Turkish diplomats.

None of this is so.

First, to memorialize the genocide of Armenians is no more anti-Turk than to memorialize the victims of the Holocaust is anti-German. Are the many events marking the liberation of the concentration camps this month offensive to German-Americans?

Second, this is not an attack on the current Turkish Government. The genocide was committed from 1915 to 1923 under the Ottoman Turkish Government prior to the establishment of the current Turkish Republic. There is a problem because the current Turkish Government—unlike the current German Government—declines to acknowledge the historical facts of its predecessor's conduct. But the resolution says absolutely nothing about the conduct or policies of the Turkish Republic.

Third, it is not merely ridiculous, but also offensive to suggest that a resolution that condemns mass murder could justify further murder. The recognized leaders of the Armenian community have frequently and publicly condemned all forms of terrorism.

It is most unfortunate that 70 years after the fact of the Armenian genocide we are told by some people that to mention the facts of history is wrong—or worse, we are told that the facts of history are nonfacts, that the genocide never happened, that the deaths of 1.5 million Armenians is somehow a figment of our imagination.

Mr. Speaker, the genocide did happen. What's more, Turkish leaders not only knew it happened, they also openly commented on it at the time. That makes it all the more shocking that anyone should take seriously an effort today to pretend that the genocide is a nonfact.

Often on April 24, we quote from the files of the State Department, reading the records of the genocide as documented by American officials who served in the Ottoman Empire at the time. This year, however, I would like to read the comments to two Turkish officials—the first is the Sultan himself, and the second is founder of modern Turkey, Kemal Ataturk himself.

In an interview carried in the London press December 6, 1918, Sultan Mohammad VI acknowledged the brutalities committed upon the Armenians, expressed sorrow at what had happened and pledged, "Justice will soon be done and we will never have a repetition of these ugly events."

And judicial action was taken, to a degree. For example, on April 12, 1919, Kemal Bey, the wartime minister of food, was publicly hanged in an Istanbul square after being convicted of taking a leading role in the deportation and massacre of Armenians in the Yozqhad district. He was but one of a number of Turkish officials tried beginning in February of that year. The prosecutor at that trial said it was necessary for Turkey to punish the authors of the massacre.

The other comment was only recently unearthed in the files of the Los Angeles Examiner. It is the text of an article distributed by World Wide

News Service in 1926 under the by-line of Kemal Ataturk.

In the August 1 article, Ataturk attacks the Young Turk movement and says its members "should have been made to account for the lives of millions of our Christian subjects who were ruthlessly driven en masse from their homes and massacred."

So, there it is. The words of the leaders of the modern Turkish Republic and of its predecessor regime, both attesting to the fact of the Armenian genocide.

The Armenian people suffered greatly. The unspeakable horrors to which they were subjected in those early years of the 20th century showed what terror can be inflicted when the powers of the modern state and the modern military are united with the will to do evil.

We remember the 1½ million Armenians massacred in World War I and the half million driven into exile.

We remember their suffering. We remember the cries of anguish, the tears of terror-stricken innocents.

We remember because it is our responsibility, our duty to those who suffered so tragically. We remember because it is our prayer that this must not happen again, that mankind must not inflict such suffering on fellow man.

We remember today.

We will remember tomorrow.

We must remember every day.●

● Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, there is a passage from the Gospel According to Luke (Luke 6:37) which I believe is relevant to the mission which we seek to accomplish here today:

> Judge not, and ye shall not be judged; condemn not and ye shall not be condemned; forgive, and ye shall be forgiven.

There is throughout all of history an unceasing chronology of evils perpetrated by mankind unto itself. It is a tragic commentary on the condition of the human conscience that we have for centuries resorted to and endured episodes of man's inhumanity toward his fellow man.

We seem never to have sufficiently learned from these previous mistakes. We may recoil from individual horrors, but our outrage diminishes with the passage of time, only to be reconstituted at the next atrocity.

Although it is hoped that through successive generations we have elevated our regard for human life, we do not yet seem capable of abandoning violence in favor of reason. There is a dual principle which ought to guide us as we commemorate the infamies of history:

First, we must never allow ourselves to forget the calamities wrought by barbarism and, as we memorialize the victims, should learn from our experience and strive not to repeat the mistakes of the past; and

Second, we should endeavor, as we assess moral judgment, to place the blame rightfully on the perpetrators and not to perpetually condemn succeeding generations which were not responsible for events which preceded them.

Time cannot erase the stain of immorality from the actions of the Ottoman Turks who persecuted, exiled, or annihilated more than 2 million Armenians from 1915 to 1923. Nothing we do here today can even minimally compensate for the lives lost. We can remember what occurred. We can condemn the abomination. Punishment, at this date, must be administered by a higher authority. We are left with an imperative that this must never happen again.●

● Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, on this the 70th anniversary of the Armenian genocide, victims' descendants throughout the world carry with them both the memory of this great human tragedy and a deep faith in the possibility for a better world. The memories with which they are haunted are quite real.

The following accounts were provided by the Honorable Henry Morgenthau, our own Ambassador to Turkey at the time of the genocide:

> The only purpose of sending these men out in the open country was that they might be massacred. In order that they might have no strength to resist or escape by flight, these poor creatures were systematically starved * * *. These massacres were not isolated happenings; I could detail many more episodes just as horrible * * *. throughout the Turkish empire a systematic attempt was made to kill all able-bodied men, not only for the purpose of removing all males who might propagate a new generation of Armenians, but for the purpose of rendering the weaker part of the population an easy prey * * *. When the signal was given for the caravans to move, therefore, they almost invariably consisted of women, children, and old men * * *. The Armenians began to die by the hundreds from hunger and thirst * * * thousands fell and died or were killed where they lay * * *. And thus, as the exiles moved, they left behind them another caravan—that of dead and unburied bodies, of old men and of women dying in the last stages of typhus, dysentery, and cholera, of little children lying on their backs and setting up their last pitiful wails for food and water * * *. Sometimes, when crossing the stream, the gendarmes would push the women into the water, shooting all who attempted to save themselves * * *. Frequently, the women themselves would save their honor by jumping into the river, their children in their arms.

The Ambassador tells of a woman's account, "she shuddered to recall how hundreds of children were bayoneted by the Turks and thrown into the Euphrates * * *. In a loop of the river near Erzinghan, she said, the thousands of dead bodies created such a barrage that the Euphrates changes its course for about a hundred yards." And finally, the Ambassador tells us, "The real purpose of the deportations was robbery and destruction; it really represented a new method of massacre."

When the Turkish authorities gave the orders for these deportations, they were merely giving the death warrant to a whole race; they understood this well, and in their conversations with me, they made no particular attempt to conceal the fact.

I submit to this Congress that no Armenian of good conscience seeks revenge or condones the actions of those who perpetrate acts of terror. What is required of the Turkish nation now is simply an admission of guilt, the first step in a civilized reconciliation of a conflict left too long unresolved. Instead the Government of Turkey has added a hideous new twist to its policy of denial. Officials in Ankara and their compensated agents throughout the world are suggesting that the peaceful words of Armenian survivors and American Congressmen serve as encouragement to terrorism, and seek to censor their free expression. No Turkish Government nor any profit-based public relations firm can ever, ever even pretend to decide what will or will not be said in the U.S. Congress. Further, Ankara's attempts to link the peaceful expression of thoughts in a democratic forum to the sickening violence of terrorism reflects the inevitably desperate position of those who seek to substitute rhetorical subterfuge for documented historical truth. The linkage of Armenians as a group to the terrorism of fringe elements is a crime not only against Armenian survivors but against the self-respect of the Turks themselves.

It is the intransigence of Turkish policy which encourages terrorism, in that it heightens the frustration of young idealists and pushes them into the arms of our century's worst, most cowardly criminals, the practitioners of international terrorism who ascribe their ideals to the salvation of the oppressed and apply their efforts to the slaughter of innocent.

Concommitant with this, official Turkish explanations claim that the policy of deportation was a necessity of war, that elements within the Armenian population threatened the security of the empire. What then, of the pictures of Armenian mothers, themselves scarcely alive, holding moribund children against their emaciated bodies as they lay captive under Turkish military guard? Were these women and infants, and the elderly victims of Turkish soldiers, threats to the empire? Generalized terror against a specific ethnic group is not merely a method of counterinsurgency, it is an end in itself. In the Turkish explanations I hear the echo of Nazi voices, telling themselves how the "Jews had their country by the throat" as the bodies of children were being dumped into mass graves.

Most of the individuals whose hands carried the stains of Armenian blood, the blood not only of proud young men but the blood of defenseless women, children and elderly individuals, have passed from the scene. But the horror of genocidal death outlasts even the memories of war, for it is the horror of mass murder, the premeditated mass murder of nearly an entire people. Again, the time for retribution has long passed. Terrorism tarnishes the glory and disturbs the eternal sleep of martyred Armenian souls. Civilized nations, democratic nations must call upon the Turkish Government to simply acknowledge the crimes of the past, so that the Turkish nation can open its heart and join self-respecting peoples around the world in condemnation of terrorism not only as a matter of policy but as an imperative of conscience.●

● Mr. TORRES. Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague and friend from California [Mr. PASHAYAN] for requesting this special order.

I rise with my colleagues here today to condemn in the strongest terms the savage slaughter of Armenian men, women, and children that took place over 70-years ago. Between 1915 and 1923, over 1½ million Armenians perished at the hands of the Turkish Ottoman Empire. The Armenian people were nearly destroyed. I believe it is important that each year Congress should bring this massacre to the attention of our constitutents and the world.

Mr. Speaker, we sometimes forget the harsh lessons of the past. We are here today so that one such lesson will not be forgotten. I ask that we recall that the Armenian genocide was the first mass effort by a government in this century to attempt the extermination of a race of people.

The merciless killing and barbarism the Armenian people suffered were to be repeated and perpetrated upon the Kulaks under Stalin, the Jews in Nazi Germany and recently, the 2½ million Cambodians who were murdered by the Pol Pot regime. Mankind has been endowed with a unique capacity for wisdom, compassion, and justice; these qualities form the basis of our society and have enabled us to become a progressive and civilized nation. When will the world learn that the seeds of ignorance, hate, and prejudice give rise to the cruelty seen at the beginning of this century?

Mr. Speaker, I rise today and ask the world community to join Congress in recognizing April 24, the 70th anniversary of the Armenian genocide, as a National Day of Rememberance of Man's Inhumanity to Man. I deplore this horrible act of genocide and I hope by bringing attention to it we can make the world a better and more peaceful place to live for generations to come.●

● Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, today is April 24, a day designated as a National Day of Remembrance of Man's Inhumanity to Man and a special day of remembrance for the many Armenian victims of strife which occurred in the Anatolian plains from 1915 to 1922.

Today marks the 70th anniversary of the beginning of these massacres of Armenians which were part of extensive civil strife marking the collapse of the Ottoman Empire. It is appropriate on this occasion to direct our attention and prayers to the memory of the thousands of men, women and children who died in these tragic events.

It is in the interest of all of us and in the interest of mankind that this type of tragedy not occur again. The leading organizations of the Armenian-American community have been seeking to work within our political system for a statement concerning these critical events in their heritage. I feel we should work with them in a constructive fashion and this is why it is important for us to recognize this day of remembrance. Some individuals may overstate the historical record, but that does not change the fact we all must recognize that a horrible tragedy occurred against the Armenians in the 1915–22 period. A few Armenians, outside the principal Armenian organizations, claim that efforts to work within our political system for a statement on this issue are fruitless and other approaches are necessary. It is important that their assertions be proven wrong.

For the Turkish Government to deny these tragic events and for the U.S. Government, in turn, to seek to prevent congressional expression on these events are not helpful. Such behavior is a denial of history. I disagree with those who argue that raising this isssue encourages terrorism. A thoughtful dialogue and compromise have a better chance of thwarting terrorism than denying all recognition of the central event of modern Armenian history. Such a denial has the effect of shutting off this group's access to the political system and of encouraging those few who insist that the issue can only be addressed by extreme measures.

We all realize that good Turkish-American relations are very important to Western security and that our bilateral agenda with Turkey is difficult and involves many critical issues in the Eastern Mediterranean and the volatile Middle East. However, by retreating from this issue and denying legitimate political expression for an important community, we will likely cause United States-Turkish ties more harm than good. We need to work with Turkey to overcome differences over this issue and minimize its impact, not try to sweep it away. No one here is talking about territorial or financial claims against Turkey: They are not matters to be addressed in the U.S. Congress.

Mr. Speaker, what is at issue is the right of an important American community which has contributed so much to this Nation in many fields to ask Congress to recognize its cultural and historical heritage. I am proud to be associated today with my colleagues in this important day of remembrance for the tragic events which befell the Armenians 70 years ago.●

● Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, today I join my colleagues, as I have in the past to speak of the premeditated genocide of the Armenian people by the Turkish Government over a 30-year period. This is never a pleasant task, but as the Congress and the American people have recognized for many years, we must continue to testify to the realities of man's capacity for cruelty and inhumanity to our fellow human beings. This marks the 21st year we have spoken out on this subject, as well as the 70th anniversary of the first genocide of the 20th century.

We are reminded that genocide can occur even in modern times. The recent news reports on the 10th anniversary of our departure from Vietnam include graphic descriptions of the genocide of the Cambodian people by Pol Pot in the late 1970's. We are also reminded of the greatest genocide known to man, the Holocaust, by the 40th anniversary of the liberation of the concentration camps.

Today, we are reminded that during the late 19th and early 20th century, the Ottoman Turkish government systematically persecuted and massacred Armenian citizens who had lived on Turkish soil for more than 3,000 years. More than 1.5 million Armenians—men, women, and children—lost their lives from 1915–23, and hundreds of thousands more fled the country. These people were led in death marches to open desert areas, and most died of starvation, disease, or exposure. Whole villages were massacred outright in the fall and winter of 1914, Armenian soldiers were worked to death or massacred in labor battalions in 1915 and throughout World War I, and 200 religious, political, and intellectual leaders were arrested in Constantinople and exiled or taken to the interior and murdered on April 24, 1915. All Armenian population centers suffered a similar fate. These acts were all part of a plan to deal with the Armenian question.

Mr. Speaker, we hear from people who do not wish to raise this subject, who claim that modern Turkey should not bear the brunt of the genocide which occurred under the Ottomans. I do not believe our speeches today in any manner endanger the lives of Turkish citizens throughout the world, and I join them in condemning acts of violence which have taken Turkish lives. But we must remember what did in fact happen. Events which were recorded by the American Ambassador to Turkey, Henry Morgenthau, Sr., and by the American press, which documented hundreds of stories about the atrocities carried out by the Turkish Government. We are not blaming the modern Turkish Government, which is a strong and valued NATO ally, but we are reminding the world of what did happen.

This is our duty, as the leader of the free world. As we were reminded during the days of remembrance commemoration in 1981 by Elie Weisel, Hitler asked during the planning of the final solution, "Who remembers the Armenians?" We do, and we will continue to make statements in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and take our place in history as people who spoke out against the Armenian genocide, who tried to prevent the tragedy which befell these people through political intervention and humanitarian aid. We must silence the voices who speak as though this event never occurred. We must not forget, we must stand together, and not be silent, if we are to ever prevent a reoccurrence of such inhumanity.●

Mr. PASHAYAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks and to include therein extraneous material on the subject of my special order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

THE BARNES-HAMILTON AMENDMENT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GINGRICH] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, I want to talk tonight about the extraordinary behavior of the House in the last few hours, and the decisive defeat by, I think, a margin expected by no one of the Barnes-Hamilton amendment resolution.

I want to lay out a frame work for people to think about an interesting development in American history, a point in which the leftwing of the Democratic Party, in alliance with very few Republicans, was able to defeat in the Committee of the Whole, but then unable to pass any kind of legislation, referring to Central America, and in which the vast majority of Republicans, in alliance with some Democrats, came very, very close to passing a major step toward freedom in Central America.

To set the stage, if I might, I want to quote from a different era, because I think you can only understand where we have arrived in 1985 by going back almost 40 years, by going back indeed, and I am quoting from Newsweek of May 5, 1947, back to when America first came to grips with the cold war, the Soviet Union, and the nature of Leninism.

Back then, in many ways, the whole situation was reversed. Back there, there were isolationists, Republicans largely from the Midwest, largely a historical pattern. Back then it was the Democrats, Harry Truman, Dean Acheson, and others, who were taking the lead talking about internationalism. And a very courageous Republican, Senator Arthur Vandenberg, of Michigan, decided to change his beliefs because he came to believe that communism was real, that the Soviet Union was a danger, that something had to be done. In a sense, where we are tonight is we are looking for the Arthur Vandenberg of the Democratic Party, for a man or woman willing to stand up and say communism is real, the Soviet Union is a danger, it is necessary to do something.

Back then Vandenberg said, "If Congress fails to act aggression will get the green light and the rest of the world, including America, will get the red light." I think he honestly believed that if we did not try to stop the Soviet Union and communism in Greece and in Turkey, countries much more distant than Nicaragua, El Salvador, Honduras, that communism would become a greater threat to America.

It is fascinating because back then the great bulk of opposition was from isolationist Republicans. But there were three pioneers, and I quote: "Three Wallace-minded leftwing Democrats"—and Wallace back then was the former Vice President of the United States—very, very leftwing oriented, a man who managed to more consistently be an ostrich in ignoring the truth about communism than any other man of his time, and a man, by the way, whose 1948 campaign for President was strongly supported by George McGovern, a man who developing the whole theme of the modern ostrich wing of the Democratic Party is really the grandfather today.

One of those three Wallace-ite Democrat Senators today serves in the House. But he is really a distinguished senior Member, a man who many years ago voted against aid for Greece and Turkey.

What is fascinating is the vast number of younger Members who, growing up I think largely in the 1960's and early 1970's, honestly came to believe in their fervor in opposing the war in Vietnam that there was no real communism; that is, the Soviet Union really was not a danger, that there was nothing to be afraid of.

I have referred before on this floor to the ostrich wing of the Democratic Party. As I said today, in all fairness, ostrichism is a bipartisan problem. There are some ostrich Republicans although in all candor I think there is an entire herd of ostriches in the Democratic Party, whereas there are relatively few ostriches in the Republican Party. There are ostriches in the news media, there are ostriches in the academic world, there are people in Government who just cannot quite believe in Marxism-Leninism.

Let me give you an example: The Department of State December 26, 1979, from the American Embassy in Managua, a document called the 72-hour document. A very clear, systematic statement of the determination of the Leninists in Nicaragua to establish a dictatorship in Nicaragua.

Books that have been published on the FSLN, which is the Leninist Party, the Communist Party in Nicaragua, which has taken power, indicate clearly, and you can go back as early as 1957 and you will find one of the Nicaraguan Communists writing a brochure entitled, "A Nicaraguan Visits Moscow." There he explains that Stalin was a wonderful person, the Russians have religious freedom in the Soviet Union, there is freedom of the press in the Soviet Union, and he describes the crushing, the crushing of the Hungarian revolution as an example of Soviet self-criticism.

Now that man, a man who could go to Moscow and find religious freedom, could go to Moscow and find freedom of the press, could believe that killing Hungarians was self-criticism, that man was the intellectual father of the modern Nicaraguan Communist Party, and is obviously a pretty committed Leninist. My objection to the entire ostrich wing of the Democratic Party and the incredible, and I repeat incredible Barnes-Hamilton resolution that came up today, is the mentality behind it. They talk about the idea in this document, and I am quoting from the actual resolution offered today, the Barnes-Hamilton resolution, a nine-page document available to everyone, in which they say, and I think this maybe illustrates my frustration and the frustration of those of us who fear communism as much as any single quote in here, on page 2 they say, "Combatants on both sides of the conflict in Nicaragua have expressed in words their goals for peace and democracy in Nicaragua."

Now, let me say, and I challenge not just tonight but any night, any time we have special orders, any Democrat who is willing to come over and debate my following assertion: If all you look at is expressing in words goals for peace and democracy I can find quotes from Adolf Hitler, from Josef Stalin, from Lenin, from Mao Tse-tung, I can find quotes from Fidel Castro. Peace and democracy in Communist language are words to be used to deceive the West; they are words to be used to mock the Americans.

I have cited before and have shown on this floor the volume of Grenadian papers which is available for any American to get from the State Department that shows you what the Communists themselves said, because in Grenada we captured Communist documents from their internal memoranda, and we know what the Communists said to themselves.

This Barnes-Hamilton proposal suggests, for example, and I quote: "The Congress will continue to monitor developments in Nicaragua."

Let me suggest, and again, I offer this to anyone who would like to debate it at a future time, that you could find in 1979 from 1980, from 1981, from 1982, from 1983, from 1984 and now from 1985, pious declarations that we will monitor. Can you imagine? Had Auschwitz existed, had people been dying, we would have been told, well, "We will monitor developments."

And you say that is strong language. There is a Gulag Archipelago today. Gulag is the Russians prisons that have been described by so brilliantly by Solzhenitsyn.

There is today people being killed in Afghanistan. Even in today's paper, the Soviet Union said arrogantly, it would not even talk about killing the American soldier in East Germany. Today the Nicaraguan Government is a Communist dictatorship. Today Fidel Castro is doing things designed to hurt America and create a more powerful Communist movement.

Their offer in the Barnes-Hamilton proposal: "The Congress will continue to monitor developments." Can you imagine Gorbachev in the Kremlin, quaking in his boots as Congress monitors? Can you imagine the Communists in Nicaragua eagerly excited for the next congressional report; worried about the monitoring? Somehow it is sad, it verges on pathos.

I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me. Does it not strike the gentleman as somewhat awed; we heard the debate here on the House floor that literally dozens of our colleagues came to the floor, speaking against the Contras but suggesting in the course of their remarks that they also were not doing anything in favor of the Sandinistas because they really did believe the Sandinista Communists were in fact running the country the wrong way; in fact were oppressing people.

Time after time after time they came to the floor and assured us that they were in no way pro-Sandinista Communist; that in fact it was totally different from that, and yet when I turned on the television this morning, what did I see but those Nicaraguan Communists on the air, praising the House of Representatives for what it had done the night before.

That shocked me. I mean, here were people who defeated military aid to the Contras in the vote yesterday, cheered and clapped on the floor last night as they did it, and who this morning were being praised by the Nicaraguan Communists for what they had done.

Mr. GINGRICH. Could the gentleman explain a little further, this was a Communist from Nicaragua who was on American television?

Mr. WALKER. Yes. What we had was a spokesman for the Nicaraguan Communists who was praising the House of Representatives for the actions that it had taken yesterday, and was condemning the Senate for passage of their resolution which of course had supported the Contras.

It seemed awfully strange to me, after hearing all the speeches on the floor from people who proclaimed that they were doing nothing to help the Sandinistas because, after all, they had grave questions about what was happening in Nicaragua, to have the exact actions that they had taken specifically praised by the Communists that they claimed they were not helping.

You know, it just strikes me that there is something awfully wrong with that, and I would certainly like to hear an explanation from somebody who tells me that they are anti-Nicaraguan Government because of all of the atrocities that are going on down there, and yet is receiving praise from the very people that they say they are opposed to.

Mr. GINGRICH. The gentleman makes a good point. I was thinking during the debate today, as I was listening to some of the people who were speaking in favor of the Barnes-Hamilton resolution, and they kept saying—and this is sort of the standard ostrich Democratic line:

"I don't like the Communists in Nicaragua, although they like to call them Sandinistas"—they are sort of embarrassed, or don't feel comfortable, saying flatly, "I don't like the Communists in Nicaragua."

Mr. WALKER. Although, if the gentleman would yield again, they do acknowledge, when pinned down, that the Sandinista movement has in fact become a Communist movement, is that correct?

Mr. GINGRICH. Well, in fact one of them admitted the other day that Nicaragua clearly is an ally of the Soviet Union.

Mr. WALKER. I remember that. I was on the floor at that time, and that is specifically what was said. Someone who takes that point of view came onto the floor and told us specifically that, yes, they had become direct allies of the Soviet Union.

Mr. GINGRICH. In that setting, I would say to the gentleman, the thing I found fascinating was, they would say, "Well, you know, the freedom fighters aren't very nice, and the Communists aren't very nice."

But then what they are proposing in this bill was to unilaterally cripple the freedom fighters. So what you would have left is, no freedom fighters because the Americans have cut them off; then what would happen to the Communists over here?

Well, these not-very-nice Communists would still be getting weapons from Cuba and weapons from the Soviet Union and weapons from Bulgaria and weapons from North Vietnam and weapons from Libya and weapons from the Palestine Liberation Organization.

What I thought today, and the gentleman might like to join in this, if it makes sense to the gentleman, it occurred to me that possibly what we should do, who care for freedom, now that we are beginning to get concessions from the ostrich Democrats, and they are beginning to say "Gosh, you know the Communists really aren't very nice." Maybe we should provide an amendment which would say: No cutoff in American military aid can occur so long as there are Communist Cuban and Soviet advisers in Nicaragua, and so long as Nicaragua is getting weapons from the Communist bloc.

In other words, none of the restrictions that our good friends on the left would apply to the freedom fighters could be applied unilaterally. No unilateral disarmament for freedom. If they can get the Soviet Union and the Cubans to agree not to supply the Communists, then the United States would agree to negotiate.

Mr. WALKER. Does the gentleman think that our friends on the left, the ostrich Democrats, would go along with that kind of a program?

Mr. GINGRICH. I think it would be a fascinating test of their sincerity, because the thing I am fascinated with that is a real problem for the ostrich Democrats, and it is an intellectual problem, and they sort of describe it in here at one point—is that as I said earlier, you can go back every one of the last 5 years and you would get these pious declarations, much as occur here in the Barnes-Hamilton language, but nothing happens.

So the Communist sort of says, "Well, we're not going to do it." And nothing happens. And then they bluster and say, "Oh, you'd better do it." And the Communists say, "We're not going to do it." And nothing happens.

The fascinating problem, I would suggest is that when you are dealing with Communists, you are a lot better off to get them to back down and then offer to change. But if you go in and say, "Hey, we're going to cut off the freedom fighters but we hope you'll change" or, "We're going to cut off with this, but we hope you'll change."

You never move communism by appeasing it first and hoping it will get nicer.

So what I would suggest to our friends is essentially—and this is one of my three major points about this evening—but essentially first that on the issue of the fact that the freedom fighters might have some problems, and after all the Communists aren't very nice, either, why do we not try to see if we can get our friends on the left—and you and I should talk about this; maybe send out a "Dear Colleague"—offer to sit down with them and draft a bill which says, as soon as the Soviet Union and Cuba and their varied allies and friends—the Vietnamese and Bulgarians and the PLO and the Libyans—as soon as they cut off their aid at every level and pull out their advisers at every level, we would consider it.

Mr. WALKER. If the gentleman will yield, I would be very glad to work with the gentleman on that, but I have got to tell you that I am a little suspicious; we may not get very far.

Because these are the same people, for the most part, who came to the floor in favor of the nuclear freeze a few months back, and what we found out there was, they continue to talk about the fact that that was supposed to be something that was bilateral, that we were not really going to do anything until the Soviets did something; this was going to be both sides participating.

Then we found out that what they really meant by it, when it came down to voting for weapons systems was, they sent out press releases against anybody who voted for the freeze and then voted to continue certain weapons systems.

So what they were really for was unilateral disarmament. The real translation of their position was unilateral disarmament by the United States; we freeze, they don't.

Now, you know, that—so I say to the gentleman, I am a little suspicious that this is the same kind of thing, that this is a freeze of our friends as well; that we want to freeze them out of the process while the Communists continue to build up in Central America.

I have got to tell the gentleman, I am just not real certain that we are going to get very far with this approach.

Mr. GINGRICH. Well, I would agree, and I think part of the problem the ostrich Democrats have is that they have not quite gotten it in their heads yet that the U.S. Congress only controls America. That just because they would like something to happen does not mean the Russians are going to go along with it, or the Cubans, or the Communist Party internationally.

So their ability is either to keep America strong enough that we can negotiate from strength or to unilaterally weaken America, but that does not necessarily mean the Soviet Union is going to do anything.

They cannot quite understand that when you are dealing with Communists who believe in strength, in force, in secrecy, and powerful militaries and aggression, and who say openly that they are at war with the Western World, that when America weakens itself, one of the reasons the Communists are applauding is because it makes their winning the long-term struggle against the West easier, because they are saying, "Boy, those Americans are stupid."

Again, I challenge my good friends on the left. I can document systematically from Grenada, from the Arce speech in Nicaragua, and from other places, that the Communists, including Fidel Castro, systematically and deliberately lie to us. And then to say in a proposed congressional resolution, as I said earlier, that the Communists "have expressed in words their goals for peace and democracy in Nicaragua" has got to be one of the most naive statements ever proposed as a major bill on the floor of the House.

Mr. WALKER. If the gentleman will yield, it seems to me that what the gentleman is saying, at least in part, is the fact that what we hear on the floor too often are rationalizations for positions and rationalizations for votes rather than a recognition of the functional effect of what that vote does.

When casting votes on this House floor, you are not given a chance to vote "maybe"; you are given a chance to vote "yes" or "no" on resolutions or on bills or on amendments, or whatever. You are given a "yes" or "no" vote. Now, that "yes" or "no" vote is cast, I think, with proper motivation by all Members. I do not ascribe wrongful motivation for somebody making a conscious decision about their own vote. But the fact is that whatever rationalization you have made about casting that vote, it not only has the effect that you say it has, but it has some functional effects, as well, beyond this body, beyond the political system.

And I would say to the gentleman that it occurred to me the other night, as I saw some of these votes being cast, that what we saw on the House floor was people voting precisely the same way if given that "yes" or "no" vote that Mikhail Gorbachev would vote if he were in this body, given his whole philosophy and given everything he wants to accomplish in the world, he would vote precisely the same as some of the people who were voting in this body if he were here. Daniel Ortega would vote precisely the same as some of the people in this body if he were here. If Fidel Castro were here, he would vote precisely the same. The motivations might be different, but the functional effect of the vote would be the same.

Mr. GINGRICH. I think that is right. And I think we need to really draw this clearly so that none of our friends who promptly flee to sloganeering and defenses by only using strong language without looking at what we are trying to say—let me say very clearly that I think every Member of the U.S. House of Representatives is a patriot, that they sincerely want a good world, that in their hearts they are doing what they think is best in terms of dealing with communism.

The point we are making is that we are engaged in a great, long-term struggle with communism and tyranny and that the functional effect, the result, is not their intention. If a man says to you, "I really want to drive home tonight," but that man is drunk and he runs into a tree, although his intention was to ride home, the effect of having been drunk while driving was to run into a tree.

Now, if a Member comes in here and says, "You know, I really wanted peace in Vietnam, so I cut off all aid to South Vietnam. And, gosh, it fell. And we had boat refugees and tyranny. And I did not like the Cambodian Government."

Mr. WALKER. And genocide and all the things that went with it.

Mr. GINGRICH. And genocide. And they come in and they say, "And I didn't like that pro-Western government in Cambodia; it was sort of corrupt and it had all those problems, so I voted to cut off aid, and it fell, and one out of every three Cambodians died," and those who have seen "The Killing Fields" can see what happened. That was the functional effect.

Nobody in this Congress voted for the Khmer-Rouge killing a third of Cambodia. But the functional effect was to put the Khmer-Rouge in charge of Cambodia, and they killed a third of the country.

Mr. WALKER. If the gentleman will yield, we had people who said that they wanted reform in Iran, and so we came up with solutions around here, the left in this country come up with solutions for Iran that were aimed at bringing about reforms in that country. And what they gave us was the ayotollah.

Mr. GINGRICH. It is ironic, by the way—I think you could document this, maybe I should not say it, but I really think you could document it—some of the people who are most hostile to Jerry Falwell and the Moral Majority, and all that, functionally had the effect of deposing the Shah and bringing in Khomeini, who is a religious fanatic and Islamic fundamentalist; that is, the effect of what they did was not to lead to a modern, democratic Western Iran, but it led to a rise of the mullahs, and the rise of Islamic fundamentalism and the rise of a man who, they would have been appalled had you gone to them and said, "How would you like Khomeini in charge of a religious system which will persecute the Bahai, which will persecute Westerners, which will persecute women?" They would say, "Oh, I am against all that."

This functional-effect argument is at the very heart of what is wrong with the U.S. House. Because many of our good friends who are bright and sincere and well-meaning cannot come to grips with the effect of their vote, which is to allow communism and tyranny and military threats to the United States to build.

Let me carry the gentleman, if I might—because I think this is a helpful dialog—to the next problem I think that the ostrich Democrats have. And, frankly, it is also a problem which the more reasonable and more rational and more open Democrats have in thinking about this. I read the other night a speech, which disturbed me a great deal, from one of the leaders of the so-called centrist Democrats, and he said, "Oh, the Nicaraguan Communists are bad and the Nicaraguan Communists are doing bad things. The Nicaraguan Communists are potentially a threat, and we don't want the Soviet Union in Central America. And then * * * and then * * *" and there was no "then." Because the problem they face is that if Communists are serious—and I respect them. I think that Ortega is a serious Communist. I think that Borge is a serious Communist. I think that the reality is that we are dealing in Nicaragua and in Cuba and in the Soviet Union with serious men, serious Communists, and a serious Communist willing to die, willing to fight revolutions, willing to impose dictatorships.

So what do we say to them? Well, let me give you the quote again from Barnes-Hamilton, on page 4, where it says, now, if they do not shape up, here is what they promise to do. They are going to work on the Organization of American States to maintain multilateral pressure.

If called upon to do so, give serious consideration to supporting any sanctions adopted by such an organization and should consider the imposition of trade sanctions.

Let me suggest to the gentleman that the last time we tried trade sanctions was in the early 1960's. I was a college student, my two daughters, one of whom is graduating from college this year, were not yet born. And we imposed those trade sanctions on Fidel Castro, and we can see how we have deterred him from being a bad Communist; we can see how we have scared him so he does not send 25,000 troops to Africa, we can see how we have blocked him from being an open anti-American. Oh, those trade sanctions just got to him so bad, he could hardly stand it. They had no effect at all.

Mr. WALKER. If I understand what the gentleman is telling us, that is the entire strong position that they propose to take in the bill today, when they were out here telling us that if, in fact, we found out that they did not go along with us, and after 6 months here, we found out that they were, in fact, clamping down even more, and we were going to do something tough, as some of them said, what the gentleman is saying is, they propose to do exactly the tough thing that we did against Fidel Castro which have not stopped him in the least.

Mr. GINGRICH. Well, I think it is only fair to say that the list they have says, "including political, diplomatic and economic means." So whatever "political, diplomatic and economic" means. If I were a Communist adviser and I was sitting down there, if I was the Soviet adviser or the North Korean or the Bulgarian or the Cuban or the Palestine Liberation Organization or the Libyan and I was sitting there and they brought me the Barnes-Hamilton resolution to analyze, and I would read through page 4 where the United States might break diplomatic relations, who cares if you are a Communist, the United States might impose——

Mr. WALKER. We did that with Castro, too, did we not?

Mr. GINGRICH. We did that to Castro, precisely. The United States might impose economic sanctions.

Mr. WALKER. We did that to Castro, and it did not work.

Mr. GINGRICH. Furthemore, if I were them, I would say, "Fine, we will send you more goodies." And then I get to page 5, which, for the Communists, is the real key. Page 5, section 2, prohibition on funding for military or paramilitary operations in Nicaragua.

Now, what does that say to me if I were a Communist adviser? I would say, "Oh, the one thing I am really afraid of, which is force, the possibility that those freedom fighters would have enough arms and equipment and ability to come and do something serious, the only thing as a Communist I am worried about, the Congress is going to stop that, but they are not going to let me buy peanut butter."

Now, if I were a typical Communist adviser, I would sit there and say, "Let me get this straight." Frankly, if they were not already an expert on the American Congress, they would not believe it. I mean, can you imagine if we were dealing with Adolf Hitler, who was similarly a totalitarian and who studied Lenin's writings and who believed in basically the same kind of military thought, or Stalin, or Gorbachev, who was trained, apparently, by Andropov, who for 15 years was the head of the KGB. Americans cannot appreciate real Communist leaders are not nice people. They stay in power by locking people up by the millions, they stay in power by shooting people if they are not obeyed, they stay in power by taking political dissidents and putting them in mental institutions and declaring them insane.

Now, this kind of a person, a very tough man, is going to read about political, diplomatic, and economic sanctions, and then he is going to turn to the next page and see that in the very same document, having said we do not like them, we are then going to stop ourselves unilaterally, in effect, disarm unilaterally in Central America.

I will just tell you, it would seem to me that virtually any serious Communist would think that was one of the most marvelous jokes they had ever read.

I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WALKER. It seems to me that if we were looking at the same thing from the opposite side of the picture, we would regard such a resolution as a joke. For example, if in fact one of our adversaries in the world was funding some kind of insurrection against one of our allies, and we were given this document from the Soviet Union that said that we are going to help this group, but we are going to unilaterally keep ourselves out with any kind of arms and so on, we would see on our side, as a Democratic power looking at that kind of document, we would recognize it as being a joke.

Our military men would assess that and say, "We have nothing to fear from these people; it is obvious that they are not going to get any support; it is obvious that they have unilaterally cut themselves off. There is nothing to fear here; we can go ahead and do whatever we want to do." I would have to say to the gentleman that would be anybody's rational analysis of such a document.

Mr. GINGRICH. You have opened up a whole new line of thought we ought to work on and maybe do a special order at some point and talk about it. Imagine that the Soviet Union acted like the United States. Can you imagine the Vietnam war? The Soviet Union voluntarily cut off all weapons to North Vietnam?

Mr. WALKER. The end of the Vietcong.

Mr. GINGRICH. But they refused to send vodka to South Vietnam, proving they are tough. Can you imagine the Soviet Union cutting off all military aid to Syria, but they would not send caviar to Israel. Can you imagine if the Soviet Union behaved like the ostrich wing of the Democratic Party in this House, and they said, "Boy, we will show you; you mess around with us, and we will not let you have any Soviet movies next year."

Mr. WALKER. If you really make us mad, we are going to stop sending you Volga automobiles. America would come to its knees, I would say to the gentleman.

Mr. GINGRICH. There would be an immediate sense of panic. I think people need to look at this because the Soviets routinely behave with great brutality. They shoot down the Korean airliner, killing an American Congressman; they shoot an American soldier in East Germany; they invade Afghanistan, and tonight, while we are talking, they are killing people in Afghanistan.

They suppress their people; they suppress the people of Eastern Europe; they sustain a Cuban dictatorship; they are sustaining a Nicaraguan dictatorship, and we look at them and say, "Well, we cannot do anything militarily. We cannot do anything to help freedom fighters. We cannot do anything that might in any sense involve effective action. But, we will have economic sanctions.

I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WALKER. What also fascinated me was some of the ostrich Democrats who came to the floor today and suggested that the freedom fighters in Nicaragua were different from the freedom fighters that the gentleman mentioned in Afghanistan or the freedom fighters in Cambodia.

We had speeches on the House floor here today that said, well, those are different kinds of freedom fighters; it is not really the same kind of thing, and there ought not be any comparison between the two because we will deal with them in some fashion later on. In other words, now they are a little further away, as Vietnam was far away, but we pulled out on them, but we will forget that for right now. Now we are talking about Central America, and that is very close, and we have got this historic pattern.

It is all a "Blame America First" kind of concept, and no matter where the emphasis is at a particular time on the part of the Communists, we are always prepared in the House, and I use "we" in an overall sense because where the majority vote comes down all to often, we are always prepared to try to do something to appease wherever the action is the hottest. That is the disturbing thing. The gentleman has described it correctly. I think that is precisely what we are hearing here. If the situation were reversed, and it was Syria and Israel, I think the gentleman is absolutely right. If we took the action that the ostrich Democrats propose to give us in the House, the Soviet Union would say to Syria, "We are not going to give you any military weapons, but do not worry, we are really helping you because we have cut off the supply of caviar to Israel.

It makes the same kind of sense as the arguments that we heard on the House floor for the last couple of days.

Mr. GINGRICH. The gentleman talked briefly about Afghanistan and Cambodia. One of the things that I want to do in the next couple of days, and I say this to alert my colleagues in the House, is look at every single ostrich Democrat, and I have heard two today, say, "Well, if we really wanted to change the Government of Nicaragua, what we ought to do is declare war."

What I want to do is go back and say to them, "Now what is your position on Afghanistan? Are you for sending money to help the Afghan Rebels, the freedom fighters in Afghanistan against the Communists? What is your position on Cambodia?" I think there is some fancy doubletalk involved in the idea that on the one hand, close to home where we can be effective, oh, we should not send any aid down there because we ought to go to war if we really feel that strongly.

On the other hand, half-way around the world, where it will be relatively ineffective, they say, "Oh, that is fine to send covert aid there." I would raise the question, and I think in the next few days all of our colleagues on our side should systematically raise this question of our ostrich Democrat friends and say to them, "Now, I read here where you said you think if we are going to send covert aid we ought to go to war." Fine. What is your position on Afghanistan? What is your position on Cambodia? What is it you are standing for? Because I think we would suddenly discover they would go, "Oh, that is different."

I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WALKER. I would say that those very same people, I am almost certain; I cannot be absolutely certain, I am not certain just who the gentleman is referring to, but I would be fairly confident that those are the same people, who, when we went to war in Vietnam said that that was not proper either. We ought not be fighting wars where there was an indigenous revolution going on, and so in that instance what they said was, "No, U.S. military action is not proper when you are defending freedom in South Vietnam, because, after all, the North Vietnamese are just revolutionaries who want to unite their country. We found out later that they were absolutely wrong; that what they did was criminal in terms of its outcome in Southeast Asia.

Nevertheless, that was wrong. Now, when you are faced with Nicaragua, learning a lesson from Vietnam that perhaps it is not a good thing to Americanize those kinds of conflicts, that it is better to have indigenous people who are concerned about their own way of life fighting the battles. Now we hear the same people who were against overt action saying, "Well, I am against covert action there, so maybe what I am for now is overt action." They are never for fighting the adversary regardless of what the fight is.

Mr. GINGRICH. Let me say to the gentleman I do not think, and I would challenge any of the people who say you ought to declare war. To introduce a resolution and support it and agree to vote for it when it came to the floor. Because I think, frankly, they use that as a way of trying to ridicule the President rather than as a serious alternative.

Let me, if I might, carry the gentleman to one other area where I thought for the first time we began to see a forward-looking ostrich; a new kind of experience.

Mr. WALKER. If I could just interrupt the gentleman; can the gentleman describe a forward-looking ostrich? I mean, is that one that has taken its head out of the sand and is now prepared with heads up to at least view reality for a moment?

Mr. GINGRICH. I think so. It is a fascinating thing and after I describe this, the gentleman can tell me how the ostrich Democrats might fit this. But it is a forward look that I have never seen before. Suddenly we see here, on page 6, humanitarian assistance for refugees. I think it is important to focus on it because unlike Vietnam, when they cut off Vietnam, nobody put a bill in that said, "Here is how we are going to hand 500,000 people."

Mr. WALKER. Well, they did not think they were going to have any people coming. They always told us that the people would be better off under the North Vietnamese unity.

Mr. GINGRICH. There you see, this is the first sign of hope that the ostriches have learned something.

Mr. WALKER. Oh, I see what the gentleman is saying now.

Mr. GINGRICH. You see, because suddenly, for the first time, and maybe it is a process of working backward. We have not gotten them back to fighting communism; we have at least gotten them back as far as the refugees after they lose to communism.

Mr. WALKER. OK, they understand now that when Communists come in and take over a country, a lot of people are going to leave. Is that what the gentleman is saying?

Mr. GINGRICH. Yes, and this is only a halfway ostrich, though, because while they talk about humanitarian assistance for refugees, they are only talking about refugees in Central America. We should have offered an amendment tonight to add the amount of money necessary to take care of the refugees that are going to come to the United States.

When you talk to our friends from Florida and Texas and California, people who have already had a few hundred thousand refugees from Cuba and from El Salvador and from Nicaragua, or in my case, I have not only friends from Cuba who live in my district, I also have friends from Poland, I know folks from Hungary.

One of the things that always makes me wonder about ostriches is, they always tell you how great government is going to be down there in this brand new shiny revolutionary government, and people always leave. Take the case of Grenada. When we intervened in Grenada and we saved our children who were down there as students and we saved that island from communism, I do not know, and maybe, again, our friends on the left could give me a report on this, I do not know of a single person who voluntarily fled to the Soviet Union.

I may be wrong. I would love to get a list of the number of people who fled to the Soviet Union because they love communism so much they just could hardly wait to get away from those ugly, imperialist Americans who were freeing the island.

Mr. WALKER. I think the gentleman would be satisfied just to get the numbers that might have gone not quite as far as the Soviet Union, that is quite a trip, but maybe just go to Cuba. It would be interesting to know how many went to Cuba or escaped to the land of milk and honey in Nicaragua. There must be a number of them. These papers talked about all the dealings they had with those folks. There had to be some of those people who went to those places.

Mr. GINGRICH. It seemed to me the distinguished gentleman from Maryland who introduced the Barnes-Hamilton resolution, and as I understand it is chairman of the subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Affairs which deals with this topic, I think we should send him a formal letter and ask him if he would tender a report on what was the relative flow of refugees, how many people rushed out of Grenada and rushed to Havana in order to get to be real Communists with Fidel.

Mr. WALKER. We know one thing, do we not? The people who had escaped the Communist government there and had come to the United States from Grenada are now going home to Grenada. After the United States took over in Grenada, the outmigration stopped and the in-migration began. I have read several articles about the people who have left the United States now to go home again.

Mr. GINGRICH. Because they wanted to live in their own country.

Mr. WALKER. That is right. In other words, the refugee flow stopped as soon as we brought freedom to that country, and we see now people headed back home to their own homeland.

Mr. GINGRICH. I was the other day in Miami and had a chance to meet with a number of Cuban refugees who would love a chance to be free in their own country and who talked about what it was like to live 90 miles from a Communist dictatorship.

I guess the point I would make is that we have here a half step toward the ostrich getting its head out of the sand because they at least mention refugees. I think it should also lead them to pause and think why are all these refugees out there? Why is it that every week right now in Honduras, but more importantly in Costa Rica, a free, democratic country, every week now there are people fleeing out of Nicaragua, young men fleeing the draft, people who believe in religious freedom fleeing from Communist tyranny, and every week there is a migration of human beings out of Nicaragua.

One of the tragedies of the Soviet system everywhere it goes is that as it oppresses human freedom, people leave their homes, their families, their neighbors, they flee their culture, their food, their customs, their language and they go to a strange place because people love freedom and fear tyranny.

Mr. WALKER. If the gentleman would yield further, I think that the empirical evidence is obvious worldwide. Where are these huge refugee camps and concentrations in the world today? Well, they are on the borders of Thailand, people fleeing the Communists in Southeast Asia. They are on the borders of Ethiopia, people fleeing the Communist terror there and the starvation brought on by the mismanagement of the economy by the Communists. They are on the borders of Nicaragua, as the gentleman states.

Throughout the world, where Communists are seeking to coalesce their power, huge refugee camps are being built and are housing hundreds of thousands of people who have fled that kind of oppression.

It is also interesting to note that where democracy is flourishing around the world that you do not have those refugee camps. The refugee camps are in those democratic countries only because of people fleeing out of Communist regimes, but there are no refugee camps being formulated because people are fleeing democracies and freedom around the world; they are fleeing Soviet-style oppression.

It seems to me you can offer empirical data on continent after continent of that kind.

Mr. GINGRICH. When you think about it, you have refugee camps in Thailand where the Vietnamese Communist army has driven people. You have refugee camps in Honduras and in Costa Rica where the Communist armies have driven people. You have millions of refugees move west in Europe to get away from the Communists. You have refugees who have moved into Florida to get away from Cuba. There is a systematic pattern that where there is communism you get refugees.

So if you did not know anything about the planet and you were, let us say, a man from Mars and you came down to Earth and you looked around, you would know instantly that Nicaragua was Communist, instantly, because you could look at the camps and say to yourself, "Aha, right there there must be tyranny of some kind. Something must be wrong."

It is interesting. It is a tragic commentary on the modern age that there is a U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees, and the other point I wanted to make for just a minute, because I find it so fascinating, and this is the last point I want to make about the Barnes-Hamilton resolution, is that in this resolution it provides that the refugee money would be spent through either the International Committee of the Red Cross or the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees.

I have to say first of all I have great respect for the International Red Cross and I think it is well worthy of support, but as one gentleman said earlier tonight, can you imagine if you had been George Washington at Valley Forge and the French had sent you a letter and said, "We know you need money to fight, we know you are trying to fight for your freedom, but we cannot send you any money but we have given $10 million to the Red Cross."

Can you imagine if you had been in the French freedom fighters in the middle of World War II and Franklin Delano Roosevelt and Winston Churchill had called De Gaulle in and said, "You know, we know you are fighting the Nazis, we know you are desperately engaged in a struggle for your life. We cannot give you any weapons but we thought you would like to know we made a contribution of

There is something fundamentally wrong, and furthermore, I was very disturbed. I have to say in all honesty that one gentleman who voted for this resolution came up to me and was sort of offended by the fact that I had used very strong language during the debate. I said during the debate that if you voted for a provision which would take the money away from all American Government agencies and, in effect, say there is not a single American Government agency worthy of spending this money, that instead we would give it away to the United Nations so the United Nations would be in there? Remember, if there is in fact communism, then that means that the Soviets, that means the Bulgarians, the Czechoslovakians, all these people that these freedom fighters have been fleeing would now be involved in the agency which is administering the relief.

I suddenly thought to myself, and I said, and maybe it was too strong, I said if you voted for this kind of a provision, you could wear an "I Despise America" button. But the reason I said that was, I was sitting there trying to crystallize how to say to the average American, what is it you have to think of your own Government and your own country to believe that there is not a single agency in your Government that could handle refugees. What is it you have to think of? Where are you at psychologically?

Somebody got up here on the floor tonight and talked about giving it to a neutral agency, and that crystallized it for me. Why would they favor neutralism on the House floor? I am not for neutralism. I am against communism. I am against tyranny. I am proud not to be neutral. What are we doing in the U.S. Congress voting for a document to give money to a neutral agency?

Mr. WALKER. If the gentleman would yield, I must say that I was disturbed along the same lines when we heard arguments made on the floor this evening that if we would simply adopt something along the lines of the resolution that the gentleman is referring to, that we had assurances from the Nicaraguan Government that they would do the following things, and a whole list of things was read off that the Nicaraguans were going to do. In other words, we took the word of the Nicaraguan Government that if we did this, they were going to respond.

Those very same people then would argue a little later that we could not trust the same kind of assurances with regard to the Michel resolution from the President of the United States. In other words, as far as the Communists in Nicaragua are concerned, we were willing to take their assurances, but when the President assures us the moneys were going to humanitarian purposes, those same people became suspect that the President was lying to us while the Communists were telling us the truth.

That really causes me to have some real problems here with the position that is being formulated in those terms. That is precisely the way it was formulated out here on the floor in the debate this evening.

Mr. GINGRICH. That is true, I say to the gentleman, and I thought about it in that context.

What we have in the Barnes-Hamilton document is this page 2 quote that "* * * both sides of the conflict in Nicaragua have expressed in words their goals for peace and democracy in Nicaragua," and they are sort of saying, "Take Ortega and the Communists at face value." But when Ronald Reagan, the American, says something, they get up here and say, "Ah! How can you trust him?"

Again let me emphasize that these people are honest, sincere, patriotic "ostriches." The problem is not that they are in any sense pro-Communist; it is that they are dumb. And they are not dumb in their IQ; they just have very great difficulty learning about the nature of communism.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I agree with the gentleman. The point we want to make—and I believe it should be reflected often in our discussions here—is that we in no way inpugn the integrity of people or impugn their motivations or anything else, but the functional effect of what they are doing really ends up leaving questions. And when we see the dichotomy in the debate that comes down that way, that we trust the disinformation campaign of the Nicaraguans more than we trust the information out of our own Government, it really does cause us major kinds of problems, particularly when those same people will say over and over again, "I went to Nicaragua, and I saw down there that they don't have any freedom of press, and that disturbs me." But yet, knowing the fact that the press down there is not free and is censored, they buy into the disinformation campaign to make their arguments here.

Yet when the information comes out of our State Department or out of our CIA or out of our intelligence sources, very often on the House floor that is suspect information, and we will not regard that with the same degree of validity that we regard the information we are getting out of Nicaragua, some of it supplied by law firms in this city hired by the Nicaraguans to make appeals to the Congress. That just does not strike me as facing up to reality.

Mr. GINGRICH. Well, let me say this: The gentleman will find this, I think, fascinating. When I was looking back at this very famous vote, really the key vote on stopping communism in Europe, from the May 5, 1947 Newsweek—and they described it, as I said earlier, by saying that the pressure was on and all the old instincts of America were to hide; and I will get to that in just a second again—let me just say that the leader of the opposition to helping save Greece and Turkey said, "if you provide aid to Greece and Turkey, it is in reality a declaration of war."

In other words, this is the very argument of our leftwing "ostrich" friends, that if we provide help for the freedom fighters, we might as well declare war, and that was the exact argument of the isolationists in 1947 who were against saving Greece and Turkey. It is incredible, the long-term, historical, intellectual heritage of certain ideas.

Let me go on, though, because I think the gentleman can see where America is at once again. This is Newsweek's description of what was at stake:

> Broadly, the Senate's vote was a vote against the traditional ideas of isolationism and neutrality, a vote in favor of containing Communism, a vote for shouldering international burdens * * * a vote to support President Truman's plan "to help free peoples to maintain their free institutions and their national integrity against aggressive movements that seek to impose upon them totalitarian regimes."

Interestingly, in 1947, when Harry Truman, a Democrat, was trying to stop communism, Ronald Reagan, a Democrat, was on his side because they were both anti-Communists. They were both concerned about freedom. And, interestingly, almost 40 years later, what do we have today? We have the leftwing "ostriches"—and I think the quote in here is right—and the leftwing "ostriches" today represent the traditional ideas of isolationism and neutrality.

And what else do we have today? Today Ronald Reagan, who was a Truman "donkey" Democrat, who was tough on communism, is a Republican. Jeane Kirkpatrick, who was a Truman-Humphrey-Jackson "donkey" Democrat, is a Republican. PHIL GRAMM, who was a conservative Democrat, is a Republican. And why? Because the "ostrich" as a symbol is driving the "donkey" out of the way in the Democratic Party, because in the Democratic Party there is almost a role reversal. The Democratic Party has replaced the Midwestern isolationism of the Republicans with a new isolationism and a new neutrality.

But let me carry it one stage further. We have talked a lot in recent weeks about the Holocaust, about the incredible period in which Nazi Germany killed millions of people and, in particular, came close to wiping out European Jewry.

Someone said to me 2 days ago, talking frankly about the McIntyre affair and the efforts by the Democratic leadership to not allow the people of Indiana to have their Representative but, instead, to impose upon them somebody else, something in which he quoted Niemöller, and I have never quite until tonight fully been able to link it together. Niemöller, the great German theologian, said at one point:

When the Nazis came for the Jew, I did nothing because I was not Jewish, and when the Nazis came for the Catholic, I did nothing because I was not Catholic, and when the Nazis came for me, there was no one left.

I never quite thought about that the same way before, but it was all coming together tonight as I sat on the floor and we debated. I suddenly realized that here in Nicaragua was a Communist government allied with the Palestine Liberation Organization, a Communist government allied with Libya, a Communist government which attacks Israel in diplomatic circles, a Communist government which publicly says it hates Israel. Here is a Communist government that votes against Israel every chance it can in the United Nations. Here is a Communist government which named one of its generating stations after a Nicaraguan Communist who was killed in 1970 in an El Al airplane, trying to hijack the airplane as a part of a Palestine Liberation Organization terror team.

Now, notice, here you have a Communist Nicaraguan with the Palestine Liberation Organization trying to seize an Israeli airplane, and after he is killed, it is Nicaraguan Communists who deliberately named their generating station in honor of a terrorist who was anti-Israeli and Communist. And in that setting, I would say to all of my friends, both in America and abroad, and to our friends in Israel, that the cause of freedom is inseparable, that the Holocaust going on today is a Holocaust of freedom, that the Gulag was as horrible and is as horrible, that the anti-Semitism in the Soviet Union today, which leads all of us to sign letters for refuseniks to try to work to make sure the people who want to emigrate to Israel can get out, is linked directly to Libya, is linked directly to the PLO, and is linked directly to Nicaragua. Let me say one other thing.

Mr. ECKERT of New York. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GINGRICH. Let me say one thing first, and then I will yield to the distinguished gentleman from New York.

When Qadhafi had his 15th anniversary party in Libya, the Nicaraguan Communists sent their No. 2 man to be there because they wanted to let him know that, as much a terrorist as he was, they were right in there as terrorists with him.

So I say to every person who cares for freedom, whether it is freedom in American or freedom in Israel or freedom in Central America, that Niemöller was right, that you have to care that the people who happen to be Jewish are able to live free in the Middle East, that you have to care that the people who happen to be Catholic are free in Central America, and you have to care that the people of any background, of any race or religion, are able to be free in their homeland. So the cause of a free Nicaragua is in that sense the cause of a free Israel and is in that sense the cause of a free America.

Mr. Speaker, I am glad to yield now to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. ECKERT of New York. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Georgia for yielding, and I am glad he made that point.

I heard some of the gentleman's remarks as I was in the office doing some work, and I am glad to hear him touch on those points. But is it not true that on Qadhafi's 15th anniversary party that he threw for himself, not only did Nicaragua send representation, but is it not true that no Arab leaders attended?

Mr. GINGRICH. That is right. The Nicaraguans were more aggressively pro-Libya and pro-Qadhafi and proterror than any of the major Arab countries.

Mr. ECKERT of New York. Another point I wish the gentleman would elaborate on is the PLO connection in Managua. Is it not true that in Managua, Nicaragua, that there is an embassy for the PLO, which is not a country, it is a terrorist organization?

Mr. GINGRICH. That is correct. The Communist government of Nicaragua recognized the Palestinian Liberation Organization as soon as it could and pledged its solidarity to the Palestinian Liberation Organization, which means, of course, that the Communist government of Nicaragua is committed to the destruction of Israel.

Mr. ECKERT of New York. I cannot think of another country that comes quickly to mind that recognizes the PLO as an embassy, that has ambassadorial status. It is an unusual move for a country.

Mr. GINGRICH. I am not sure if Communist countries routinely in general do that or not. I would be very careful. Again, we might want to ask our friends on the Western Hemisphere Subcommittee how many countries recognize the Palestinian Liberation Organization as an official government or an official movement.

Mr. ECKERT of New York. It certainly would show the sentiment.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GINGRICH. I would be glad to yield.

Mr. WALKER. You know, what our friends on the left will tell us, they think that is horrible. I mean, they come out here and they say on the floor that they think that is just terrible, that the Sandinistas are in fact recognizing the PLO and that they are anti-Semitic. They came to the well and said that. They said they are terribly disturbed about all those things down there. They are just not willing to do anything about it.

They do not say that. I am saying that. The fact is that they use all that language, but when it comes down to the fact of are you willing to do something, like support the Contras, or anything, they do not.

The fact is, as we pointed out here earlier, they are not willing to do anything, and that is the problem.

Mr. ECKERT of New York. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman.

U.S. POLICY IN CENTRAL AMERICA

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. RUDD] is recognized for 60 minutes.

● Mr. RUDD. Mr. Speaker, I have called this special order today to discuss U.S. policy in Central America and particularly the urgency in providing the requested $14 million for the freedom fighters in Nicaragua.

Earlier this month, I had the opportunity to accompany a delegation, led by Congressman G.V. MONTGOMERY, from the Armed Services Committee on a tour of seven Latin American nations, including Panama, Costa Rica, Honduras, El Salvador, and Belize in Central America. The feeling there is much different than just 1 year ago, and the people have no doubt that the United States of America is their friend. They are watching Congress closely now to see if we have the courage and the will to support them in their struggle to make real progress toward strong democracies, or if we will abandon them to fend for themselves against Marxist/Leninist insurgents.

In 1979, two-thirds of the people in Latin America lived under military governments, or governments dominated by the military. Today, however, that situation has changed dramatically. Over 90 percent of those people are living under democratic governments. Since 1980 alone, military juntas have returned the reigns of government to civilians in Peru, Bolivia, Ecuador, Honduras, Argentina, El Salvador, Panama, Uruguay, and Brazil. Guatemala has scheduled elections for October of this year. Of course, Costa Rica has been democratic for many years. It is significant to note that no government in Latin America has reverted back to dictatorship during this period.

With the exception of Nicaragua, Central America's downward economic spiral has also been halted. A regional increase in gross domestic product [GDP] of 1.2 percent in 1984 followed GDP declines of 3.3 percent in 1982 and 0.8 percent in 1983. In El Salvador, where the economy declined by 25 percent from 1980 to 1982, GDP leveled off in 1983 and rose an estimated 1.5 percent in 1984. Current estimates indicate that regional GDP, except for Nicaragua, will increase by another 2.5 percent in 1985.

This good news could be better, and the future much brighter, were it not for Marxist-Leninist insurgencies—financed and supported by the Soviet Union, Cuba, and their brokers in Nicaragua—which threaten the democratic nations in the region and force them to divert government revenues from development to defense. The guerrillas destroy infrastructure, terrorize the people, and weaken the productive forces needed to support self-sustaining growth.

While the critics fret at 55 U.S. advisers in El Salvador, they somehow forget or suppress the fact that some 9,000 Cubans, including military and security advisers, have been sent into neighboring Nicaragua. While they condemn $14 million in support for the freedom fighters, they ignore the $250 million worth of military deliveries to Nicaragua by the Soviet Union in 1984. They never mention that 78 percent of U.S. aid to the region is economic. They forget that Nicaragua maintains a military force greater than the forces of all its neighbors combined—more than would ever be needed solely for defense. Indeed, Commandante Bayardo Arce of the Sandinista regime acknowledged in a 1984 statement that the Sandinistas include among their objectives support for fraternal revolution throughout Central America.

Not only are they spreading terror across the region, but they are also terrorizing their own people. They are carrying out a campaign of genocide against the Miskito Indians. The Miskitos had supported the Sandinistas against Somoza, but when they resisted Marxist indoctrination, the Sandinistas began their calculated effort to eliminate the opposition. They arrested Indian leaders, murdered some and tortured others. There were massacres of Miskitos. Thousands were forced into relocation camps. Miskito villages were destroyed. Thousands of others were forced to flee the country altogether.

The Sandinistas moved to suppress other rights and freedoms. The only remaining nongovernment newspaper in Nicaragua, La Prensa, is censured daily. Opposition parties are denied free participation in elections. Commandante Arce went so far as to call elections a nuisance and pointed out that they would be totally out of place in terms of usefulness were it not for the pressure put on them by the United States.

The Sandinistas have moved to secure complete control within Nicaragua, this despite their pledge to the Organization of American States in 1979 that if their revolution succeeded, they would establish a democratic, nonaligned regime with a mixed economy.

The fact is that the Sandinistas have been hostile to freedom and democracy, and to the United States from the start. They had no intention of ever honoring their commitment to implement democratic reforms in Nicaragua.

What they would like more than anything is for the Congress to defeat the $14 million for the Contras so that they can continue their military campaign against their neighbors without the resistance they are now facing on their home turf.

If we fail to support the freedom fighters in Nicaragua and instead allow the Sandinistas to export their Marxist revolution, our friends in the region which are making progress toward strong democracies will fall. They will be condemned to a lot far worse than they ever experienced before, and the insurgency will spread, possibly to our own border, forcing us into an extremely costly showdown to protect our national security. Not only are the freedom fighters struggling to restore freedom to Nicaragua, but they are also fighting to preserve freedom throughout Central America. They deserve our support.

Mr. Speaker, following is a Dear Colleague letter prepared by Chairman SONNY MONTGOMERY regarding his recent trip to Latin America:

Washington, DC, April 18, 1985.

DEAR COLLEAGUE: A group of us from the Armed Services, Veterans' Affairs and Appropriations Committees visited seven countries in Latin America earlier this month to assess United States, Central and South American security matters, as well as to review the participation of U.S. National Guard troops in the Blazing Trails and Ahaus Tara III exercises. We had the opportunity to meet with numerous U.S. diplomatic and military personnel as well as with high-level Latin American military and government leaders—most notably with President Jose Napoleon Duarte of El Salvador. We encountered a number of recurring security and defense themes on our journey—themes about which there was surprising unanimity of opinion—and we would like to pass along our findings for your consideration.

First, U.S. and Latin American officials agree that Cuban and Nicaraguan support of leftist insurgents in El Salvador and elsewhere in the region poses the most serious threat to democracy and stability in Central America. There is no doubt that Cuba and Nicaragua are continuing to export their revolution in terms of providing financial support, military hardware, training, and sanctuary to the violent opponents of democratically elected governments.

Second, U.S. and Latin American officials agree that the United States must continue to provide significant resources to democratic forces in Central America in order to counteract the effects of Cuban and Nicaraguan influence. President Duarte, in particular, emphasized that if the United States cuts off aid to democratic forces in Central America, the United States will ensure a permanent military imbalance in the region and contribute to the victory of totalitarian forces.

Third, the officials with whom we spoke stressed that Latin America views U.S. approval of the $14 million humanitarian assistance report to the Nicaraguan Contras as a "litmus test" of the U.S. commitment to the region. They ask why the United States hesitates to actively export its most precious commodity—democracy—when Cuba and Nicaragua do not hesitate to export their Marxism. They ask why the United States hesitates to support Nicaraguans who are willing to risk their lives to restore freedom and democracy to their country in order that American men need not sacrifice their lives sometime in the future.

The Contras have reached a critical juncture in their fight to restore democratic freedoms to Nicaragua. Today, there are more Contras in the field than there ever were Sandinistas during the revolution—and the Sandinistas are vulnerable. Now that success is within reach, the United States must not "pull the rug out" from under the freedom fighters.

In closing, we would like to clarify who the Contras really are. We have heard some Members of Congress argue that the Contras are the same national guardsmen who terrorized the Nicaraguan people under the Somoza regime and that the United States should not support these "murderers and torturers." In actuality, less than two percent of the total Contra forces ever served in the Nicaraguan National Guard. An even more telling statistic is that 42 percent of all regional commanders are ex-Sandinistas. In other words, 42 percent of the Contra middle grade leadership are men who deserted the Sandinista ranks when the Sandinistas betrayed their promise of democracy and freedom in Nicaragua.

When the Contra vote comes up in the House of Representatives, U.S. credibility in Central America will be directly at stake. We urge you to cast a vote for democracy and approve the $14 million humanitarian assistance request.

Sincerely,

G.V. (Sonny) Montgomery, John Paul Hammerschmidt, Sam Hall, Eldon Rudd, Floyd Spence, Bob Stump, William Hendon, Members of Congress.●

● Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to join six of my colleagues, with whom I made a recent trip to five Central American and two South American countries, in sharing some of our observations about political, economic and security problems facing this region.

Our delegation, during the 8-day trip, reviewed security-related matters and observed the participation of U.S. Army National Guard units in military and engineering exercises in Central America. The delegation visited Venezuela, Ecuador, Panama, Costa Rica, Honduras, El Salvador, and Belize, meeting with high level civilian and military officials.

We found a unanimous view among Latin American officials that Cuba and Nicaragua are continuing to export their revolution, in the form of weapons, training, and financial support, to leftist insurgents in El Salvador and elsewhere in the region. This, the officials agreed, is the most serious threat to democracy and stability facing Central America.

In order to counteract the effects of this leftist influence, the military and civilian officials agreed that it is vital that the United States continue to provide aid to democratic forces in Central America.

While in El Salvador, the delegation had the honor of meeting with President Jose Napoleon Duarte. President Duarte reiterated to me the views that he shared when we met in September 1981, that if the United States cuts off aid to democratic forces in Central America, the United States will ensure a permanent military imbalance in the region and contribute to the victory of totalitarian forces. He also stressed that he is continuing to work for progress in El Salvador on all fronts, particularly in stopping human rights abuses.

One way that the United States is showing support for its democratic allies in Latin America is through joint military exercises between United States and Latin American troops. While in the region, we observed two of these joint exercises, the Blazing Trails exercise taking place in Panama, and the Ahaus Tara III exercise on the Honduras-Nicaragua border. Let me say that the professionalism and morale of the U.S. National Guard, Reserve, and Regular personnel participating in these exercises was of the highest caliber.

In the Blazing Trails engineering exercise, U.S. Army National Guard and Panamanian forces are working together to construct 42 kilometers of roadway to link isolated valleys in the Veraguas Province of Panama to the Pan American Highway. These U.S. Guard members are honing their engineering skills while completing their annual 2-week period of active duty training. When finished, the road will improve the livelihood of local Panamanians who are now isolated, as well as give American citizen-soldiers the opportunity to gain experience in deployment techniques and training with heavy engineering equipment.

The Ahaus Tara III project in Honduras is also a fine example of U.S. military personnel working hand-in-hand with the Honduran armed forces. The first phase of the project concentrated on engineering tasks, such as improving runways at several airstrips, well digging, and improvements to tactical positions on the Honduran-Nicaragua border. In phase two, U.S. National Guard troops and Honduran troops conducted field training exercises with tanks and armored vehicles to teach the Honduran armed forces how to defend against a conventional attack. Phase three will be a joint counterinsurgency field training exercise, which will include parachute training.

Not only do these exercises show America's support for her allies, but they provide active and reserve units with real life training that could not be duplicated under other circumstances, which enhance the capabilities of our armed forces. In addition, many of these projects provide substantial construction and humanitarian assistance to the participating countries, increasing goodwill between the U.S. and its Latin American neighbors. I believe that these joint exercises should be expanded, as they benefit all who participate.

Lastly, I would like to convey to my colleagues some observations made by Maj. Gen. Jose Antonio Olavarria Jiminez, commander of the Venezuelan Army, during our meeting with him. Our discussion focused on the internal leftist guerrilla threat Venezuela faced in the 1960's and how that problem was successfully eliminated. General Olavarria noted that Venezuela is the only country that solved its internal insurgency problem without suspending civil liberties or eliminating democratic institutions.

These successes were achieved not only through the use of military force, but also by using political, social and economic solutions, an approach that is known as the "Venezuelan model." For example, the government offered the guerrillas amnesty, and an opportunity to participate in the political process in return for laying down their arms. Today, some former guerrillas are serving in the Venezuelan Congress.

General Olavarria believes that El Salvador today is in the early stages of the Venezuelan model, and stressed that President Duarte deserves full support in his effort to solve his country's problems. I concur with General Olavarria and hope that Congress will continue to work for democracy in this troubled region.●

U.S. POLICY IN NICARAGUA AND EL SALVADOR

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. LAGOMARSINO] is recognized for 10 minutes.

● Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, Congressman MIKE DEWINE and I have just returned from Nicaragua and El Salvador, where we met with government officials and opposition leaders. From all the discussions we had, our overall conclusion is that opposition leaders in Nicaragua fear for their continued existence if the Contras do not remain as a force for pressuring the Sandinistas to moderate their regime.

In Nicaragua, representatives of several opposition groups told us they had been "enemy No. 1" for the Sandinistas before the Contras appeared; now they are "enemy No. 2." They also say they would once again be the primary target for the Sandinista regime and probably would not survive if the Contras disappeared.

Nicaraguan Vice President Sergio Ramirez told us that he considers it necessary to reach a bilateral agreement between the United States and Nicaragua. He said:

> We have specific interests in our country, and we recognize the United States has interest in Central America. We are not going to challenge those interests if we can reach a bilateral agreement.

We interpret his statement to mean that if a deal can be cut to protect the Sandinista regime from the opposition of its own people then they are willing to stop exporting their revolution. The Sandinistas gave assurances that they were not supporting guerrilla groups in other countries and also agreed to negotiate to stop such support.

When we sought to accept the offer of Nicaraguan President Daniel Ortega to inspect their military bases to verify their nonoffensive nature, we were refused. Deputy Foreign Minister Victor Tinoco told us the invitation had been extended to Speaker O'NEILL to name a bipartisan commission to go to Nicaragua to see the military installations, that the refusal was nothing personal but that Members of Congress traveling to Nicaragua would not be shown the bases, only the one "official commission." While any country certainly has the right to control access to its military bases, it seemed to us that the Sandinistas were less than sincere in their offer to demonstrate their openness and their willingness to prove they have no offensive military intentions.

As for freedom of the press, freedom of religion, freedom to organize labor unions, respect for due process and all other aspects of human rights, our discussions invariably included comments that things were worse now than they were before the Sandinistas took power. Much attention has been given lately to reports of improved human rights conditions in Nicaragua with credit going to the Sandinistas based on studies by Americas Watch. However, an official of the independent Permanent Human Rights Commission in Nicaragua told us that Americas Watch, after publishing an accurate account in 1982 of the abuses of the Sandinista regime against the Miskitos Indians has since lost all objectivity and credibility in its reporting. He said they now rely too much on official government information and are not in the country long enough to verify what is true and what is heresay. He further stated that for their most recent report Americas Watch did not take the reports of abuses of the Sandinista regime compiled by the Human Rights Commission.

Reports of the total domination of the economy by the Sandinistas were repeated by almost everyone we talked to. From control of ration cards to requirements of selling all production to the government which in turn sells the products to the populace, the idea of private enterprise seems like something the Sandinistas only give lip service to. Moreover, the pervasive influence of the "internationalists"—those non-Nicaraguans from Cuba, Bulgaria, Libya, North Korea, and other bloc nations—was routinely criticized. The Cuban presence in particular created serious concern because they seem to be the ones making the decisions at all levels of the government according to firsthand accounts. The exact number of Cubans is unclear with the Nicaraguan Government claiming only 800 and our sources placing the number much higher, anywhere from 2,000 to 3,000 military and 5,000 to 6,000 nonmilitary. Of course, the exact number is irrelevant to the influence the Cubans exert. After all, administration critics claim 55 American military trainers in El Salvador wield influence out of proportion to their numbers.

Our discussions in El Salvador, in particular with President Duarte, confirmed that the country is making progress in reenforcing the democratic process that it has successfully implemented with elections last year and parliamentary elections March 31. President Duarte assured us he would seek broad participation of all political sides in his government. He also reaffirmed his intention to pursue a national dialog with the armed opposition forces fighting his government and to continue to seek to "humanize the conflict." By humanizing the conflict he is trying to get the guerrillas to agree not to attack the people and the economic structure of the country which directly affects the well-being of the poorest sectors of society.

President Duarte reacted strongly against allegations that the military forces of his country were conducting an indiscriminate bombing campaign against innocent civilians. He has established rules of engagement for the military and for air strikes against targets in civilian zones. He says guerrilla allegations of indiscriminate bombings of civilians have not been substantiated. He further protested any proposal of conditions on military aid to El Salvador as weakening his position rather than strengthening it. "It's as though I would have to come to Congress to tell you to come to El Salvador and talk to my generals because they will not listen to me," President Duarte told us. He asked us to give him the chance to demonstrate that he has the respect and support of the military and that they will follow his leadership without being blackmailed into doing it.

For El Salvador, one of the major areas of concern continues to be the state of the economy. While the nation is no longer suffering negative economic growth, the cumulative cost of the guerrillas attacks on the infrastructure of the nation over the past 4 years has surpassed $1 billion. American development assistance in that time has barely matched the cost of the war the guerrillas are waging. The guerrillas are not targeting only military objectives. They are moving into the city and striking innocent civilians and destroying homes, offices, schools, hospitals and, most recently, a kindergarten.

Salvadoran Defense Minister Vides Casanova reiterated for us the importance of continued military assistance to El Salvador as a budget-conscious measure. He reminded us it is cheaper to send U.S. military aid to El Salvador than to send the U.S. military. A prominent church official in El Salvador told us that as long as Nicaragua and Cuba were supporting the rebels, then the United States should continue to support El Salvador with military aid. When asked if that were the view of Archbishop Rivera y Damas, he said that Rivera y Damas, because of his church position, does not feel he can say that publically. Nevertheless, he said, Rivera y Damas has never told him not to say it.

As we approach consideration of the President's request for humanitarian assistance for the Contras, we must also remember that our policy toward Nicaragua is closely linked with the amount of money we are forced to spend in helping our allies in the region. As long as Nicaragua, with the help of Cuba, remains as a source for exporting revolution to its neighbors, then we must either counter that threat directly or expect ever greater expenditures of aid to our allies to help them counter the subversion they face from their Sandinista neighbor.

The theme of all our talks in Nicaragua and El Salvador was a constant plea to prevent the Sandinistas from institutionalizing their regime in Nicaragua. Those we talked with believed the final outcome in Central America will be five or none. All five must achieve democracy, or none of them will if Nicaragua is allowed to become another Cuba. As Members who had useful, informative meetings in these two countries in Central America, we urge you to consider the tremendous psychological impact on our allies if the Congress fails to approve the funding of humanitarian aid for the Contras. We urge you also to seriously consider the security interests of our own country in trying to determine the most effective policy for the United States toward Nicaragua. Without exception, our discussions convinced us that some form of pressure must be maintained on the Nicaraguans to force them to uphold their stated objectives of political pluralism, a mixed economy and nonalignment as well as blocking their export of revolution. By approving the $14 million at this time, we place the burden on the Sandinistas to prove their sincerity. We have demanded internal dialog for El Salvador, we can demand no less for Nicaragua.

Approving this money for the Contras does not guarantee success, but defeating this measure does guarantee failure for U.S. interests in our own backyard. We urge you to make the very difficult decision and approve the President's request for the $14 million.●

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to:

Mr. TRAFICANT (at the request of Mr. WRIGHT), for today, on account of a death in the family.

Mr. BADHAM (at the request of Mr. MICHEL), for today, on account of illness in the family.

SPECIAL ORDERS GRANTED

By unanimous consent, permission to address the House, following the legislative program and any special orders heretofore entered, was granted to:

H.R. 1555

By Mr. BROOMFIELD:

(Amendment in the nature of a substitute for the Foreign Affairs Committee amendment.)

—Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "International Security and Development Cooperation Act of 1985".

TITLE I—MILITARY SALES AND RELATED PROGRAMS

SEC. 101. FOREIGN MILITARY SALES CREDIT AUTHORIZATIONS AND AGGREGATE CEILINGS.

(a) AUTHORIZATIONS OF APPROPRIATIONS.—The first sentence of section 31(a) of the Arms Export Control Act is amended to read as follows: "There are authorized to be appropriated to the President to carry out this Act $5,463,414,000 for fiscal year 1986 and $5,463,414,000 for fiscal year 1987.".

(b) FY 1986 AND FY 1987 FMS PROGRAMS.—Sections 31(b) and (c) of such Act are amended to read as follows:

"(b) AGGREGATE CEILING AND TERMS FOR FMS CREDITS.—

"(1) ANNUAL AGGREGATE CEILING.—The total amount of credits extended under section 23 of this Act shall not exceed $5,463,414,000 for fiscal year 1986 and $5,463,414,000 for fiscal year 1987.

"(2) AGGREGATE CEILING ON CONCESSIONAL FINANCING.—Of the aggregate amount of financing provided under this section, not more than $553,900,000 for fiscal year 1986 and not more than $553,900,000 for fiscal year 1987 may be made available at concessional rates of interest. If a country is released from its contractual liability to repay the United States Government with respect to financing provided under this section, such financing shall not be considered to be financing provided at concessional rates of interest for purposes of the limitation established by this paragraph.

"(3) AUTHORIZATIONS FOR EXTENDED REPAYMENT TERMS.—For fiscal year 1986 and fiscal year 1987, the principal amount of credits provided under this section at market rates of interest with respect to Greece, the Republic of Korea, Portugal, Spain, Thailand, and Turkey shall (if and to the extent each country so desires) be repaid in not more than twenty years, following a grace period of ten years on repayment of principal.

"(c) COUNTRY-SPECIFIC PROVISIONS.—

"(1) ISRAEL.—

"(A) EARMARKING.—Of the aggregate total of credits extended under section 23 of this Act, not less than $1,800,000,000 for fiscal year 1986 and not less than $1,800,000,000 for fiscal year 1987 shall be available only for Israel.

"(B) FORGIVENESS.—Israel shall be released from its contractual liability to repay the United States Government with respect to the credits provided pursuant to subparagraph (A).

"(C) LAVI PROGRAM.—Of the amounts made available for Israel under section 23 of this Act—

"(i) up to $150,000,000 for fiscal year 1986 and up to $150,000,000 for fiscal year 1987 shall be for research and development in the United States for the Lavi program, and

"(ii) not less than $250,000,000 for fiscal year 1986 and not less than $250,000,000 for fiscal year 1987 shall be made available for the procurement in Israel of defense articles and defense services (including research and development) for the Lavi program, if Israel wishes to use those funds for that purpose.

"(2) EGYPT.—

"(A) EARMARKING.—Of the total amount of credits extended under section 23 of this Act, not less than $1,300,000,000 for fiscal year 1986 and not less than $1,300,000,000 for fiscal year 1987 shall be available only for Egypt.

"(B) FORGIVENESS.—Egypt shall be released from its contractual liability to repay the United States Government with respect to the credits extended pursuant to subparagraph (A).

"(3) GREECE.—

"(A) TERMS OF CONCESSIONAL CREDITS.—For each of the fiscal years 1986 and 1987, of the total amount of credits extended for Greece under section 23 of this Act, Greece shall receive the same proportion of credits extended at concessional rates of interest as the proportion of credits extended at concessional rates of interest which Turkey receives from the total amount of credits extended for Turkey under section 23 of this Act, and the average annual rate of interest on the credits extended for Greece at concessional rates of interest shall be comparable to the average annual rate of interest on the credits extended for Turkey at concessional rates of interests.

"(B) INAPPLICABILITY OF CEILING ON CONCESSIONAL CREDITS.—Credits extended for Greece for each of the fiscal years 1986 and 1987 at concessional rates of interest shall not be counted toward any ceiling established by law on concessional financing under this Act.".

SEC. 102. TERMS OF FOREIGN MILITARY SALES CREDITS.

Section 23 of the Arms Export Control Act is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 23. FOREIGN MILITARY SALES CREDITS.

"(a) AUTHORITY TO FINANCE PROCUREMENT.— The President is authorized to finance the procurement of defense articles, defense services, and design and construction services by friendly foreign countries and international organizations, on such terms and conditions as he may determine consistent with the requirements of this section.

"(b) REPAYMENT PERIOD.—The President shall require repayment in United States dollars within a period not to exceed twelve years after the loan agreement with the country or international organization is signed on behalf of the United States Government, unless a longer period is specifically authorized by statute for that country or international organization.

"(c) INTEREST RATES.—

"(1) GENERAL AUTHORITY.—The President shall charge interest under this section at such rate as he may determine, subject to the limitations contained in paragraph (2) and other provisions of law.

"(2) MINIMUM INTEREST RATES.—The interest rate charged under this section may not be less than—

"(A) 5 percent per year, or

"(B) the rate which is 7 percentage points less than the current average interest rate (as of the last day of the month preceding the financing of the procurement) that the United States Government pays on outstanding marketable obligations of comparable maturity, whichever is greater.

"(3) DEFINITIONS OF CONCESSIONAL AND MARKET RATES.—For purposes of financing provided under this section—

"(A) the term 'concessional rate of interest' means any rate of interest which is less than market rates of interest; and

"(B) the term 'market rate of interest' means any rate of interest which is equal to or greater than the current average interest rate (as of the last day of the month preceding the financing of the procurement under this section) that the United States Government pays on outstanding marketable obligations of comparable maturity.

"(d) PARTICIPATIONS IN CREDITS.—References in any law to credits extended under this section shall be deemed to include reference to participations in credits.".

(c) EFFECTIVE DATE.—This section shall take effect upon the date of enactment of this Act or October 1, 1985, whichever date is later. The amendments made by this section apply with respect to violations occurring after the effective date of this section.

SEC. 115. OFFICIAL RECEPTION AND REPRESENTATION EXPENSES.

Section 43 of the Arms Export Control Act is amended—

(1) in subsection (b) by inserting "and official reception and representation expenses" immediately after "administrative expenses"; and

(2) by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(c) Not more than $72,500 of the funds derived from charges for administrative services pursuant to section 21(e)(1)(A) of this Act may be used each fiscal year for official reception and representation expenses.".

SEC. 116. SPECIAL DEFENSE ACQUISITION FUND.

(a) CONTINUOUS ORDERS FOR CERTAIN ARTICLES AND SERVICES.—Section 51(a) of the Arms Export Control Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(3) The Fund may be used to keep on continuous order such defense articles and defense services as are assigned by the Department of Defense for integrated management by a single agency thereof for the common use of all Military Departments in anticipation of the transfer of similar defense articles and defense services to foreign countries and international organizations pursuant to this Act, the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, or other law.".

(b) LIMITATIONS ON DEPOSITS IN THE FUND.—Section 51(b) of such Act is amended to read as follows:

"(b)(1) Subject to paragraph (2) of this subsection, the Fund shall consist of collections from sales made under letters of offer, or transfers made under the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, of defense articles and defense services acquired under this chapter (representing the value of such items calculated in accordance with paragraph (2) or (3) of section 21(a) or section 22 of this Act or section 644(m) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, as appropriate), together with such funds as may be authorized and appropriated or otherwise made available for the purposes of the Fund.

"(2) Whenever—

"(A) the value (in terms of acquisition cost) of the defense articles and defense services acquired under this chapter which have not been transferred from the Fund in accordance with this chapter, plus

"(B) the amount of contracts to acquire defense articles and defense services under this chapter, exceeds $500,000,000, the collections described in paragraph (1) shall be deposited in the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.".

SEC. 117. WAIVER OF NET PROCEEDS FOR SALE OF MAP ITEMS.

Section 505(f) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "In the case of items which were delivered prior to 1975, the President may waive the requirement that such net proceeds be paid to the United States Government if he determines that to do so is in the national interest of the United States.".

SEC. 118. STOCKPILING OF DEFENSE ARTICLES FOR FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

Section 514(b)(2) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 is amended to read as follows:

"(2) The value of such additions to stockpiles in foreign countries shall not exceed $360,000,000 for fiscal year 1986 and shall not exceed $125,000,000 for fiscal year 1987.".

SEC. 120. EXCHANGE TRAINING.

Chapter 5 of part II of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"SEC. 544. EXCHANGE TRAINING.

"In carrying out this chapter, the President is authorized to provide for attendance of foreign military personnel at professional military education institutions in the United States (other than service academies) without charge, and without charge to funds available to carry out this chapter (notwithstanding section 632(d) of this Act), if such attendance is pursuant to an agreement providing for the exchange of students on a one-for-one, reciprocal basis each fiscal year between those United States professional military education institutions and comparable institutions of foreign countries and international organizations.".

SEC. 121. TRAINING IN MARITIME SKILLS.

(a) AUTHORIZATION.—Chapter 5 of part II of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"SEC. 545. TRAINING IN MARITIME SKILLS.

"The President is encouraged to allocate a portion of the funds made available each fiscal year to carry out this chapter for use in providing education and training in maritime search and rescue, operation and maintenance of aids to navigation, port security, at-sea law enforcement, international maritime law, and general maritime skills.".

(b) EXEMPTION.—Section 660(b) of such Act is amended—

(1) by striking out "or" at the end of clause (1);

(2) by striking out the period at the end of clause (2) and inserting in lieu thereof "; or"; and

(3) by adding the following new clause after clause (2):

"(3) with respect to assistance, including training, in maritime law enforcement and other maritime skills.".

SEC. 122. SPECIAL WAIVER AUTHORITY.

Section 614(a)(4) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 is amended to read as follows:

"(4)(A) The authority of this subsection may not be used in any fiscal year to authorize—

"(i) more than $750,000,000 in sales to be made under the Arms Export Control Act;

"(ii) the use of more than $250,000,000 of funds made available for use under this Act or the Arms Export Control Act; and

"(iii) the use of more than $100,000,000 of foreign currencies accruing under this Act or any other law.

"(B) If the authority of this subsection is used both to authorize a sale under the Arms Export Control Act and to authorize funds to be used under the Arms Export Control Act or under this Act with respect to the financing of that sale, then the use of the funds shall be counted against the limitation in subparagraph (A)(ii) and the portion, if any, of the sale which is not so financed shall be counted against the limitation in subparagraph (A)(i).

"(C) Not more than $50,000,000 of the $250,000,000 limitation provided in subparagraph (A)(ii) may be allocated to any one country in any fiscal year unless that country is a victim of active Communist or Communist-supported aggression, and not more than $500,000,000 of the aggregate limitation of $1,000,000,000 provided in subparagraphs (A)(i) and (A)(ii) may be allocated to any one country in any fiscal year.".

SEC. 123. REPROGRAMMING REQUIREMENTS.

(a) REPROGRAMMING NOTIFICATIONS.—Section 634A of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 is amended—

(1) by inserting "(a)" immediately before "None";

(2) by inserting "or the Arms Export Control Act" immediately after "disaster relief and rehabilitation)" and immediately after "this Act" the second place it appears; and

(3) by adding at the end of the section the following new subsection:

"(b) The notification requirement of this section does not apply to the reprogramming of less than $25,000 for use under chapter 8 of part I, or for use under chapter 5 of part II, for a country for which a program under that chapter for that fiscal year was justified to the Congress.".

(b) ALLOCATION REPORTS.—Section 653 of such Act is amended—

(1) by inserting in subsection (a) "or the Arms Export Control Act" immediately after "sections 451 or 637)";

(2) by striking out subsection (b); and

(3) by redesignating subsection (c) as subsection (b).

(c) QUARTERLY REPORTS.—Section 36(a) of the Arms Export Control Act is amended—

(1) in paragraph (5) by striking out "cash" and by striking out ", credits to be extended under section 23, and guaranty agreements to be made under section 24"; and

(2) in paragraph (6) by striking out "cash" and by striking out "and credits expected to be extended".

SEC. 124. CONVENTIONAL ARMS TRANSFERS.

The President shall submit to the Congress a report which examines and analyzes United States policies concerning the export of conventional arms, especially sophisticated weapons, and possible approaches to developing multilateral limitations on conventional arms sales. This report shall examine and analyze—

(1) the lessons of earlier efforts to negotiate restraints on the export of conventional arms;

(2) the evolution of recipient country attitudes regarding conventional arms transfers;

(3) the prospects for engaging the Soviet Union in serious discussions concerning arms transfers, both globally and as they relate to regional security problems;

(4) possible measures by the United States and Western European suppliers to control levels of sophisticated weapons sales, both regionally and globally;

(5) the relationship between arms exports by Western European countries and the needs of those countries to support their domestic military procurement programs; and

(6) the timing and phasing of international conventional arms control negotiations.

This report should be unclassified to the extent possible, with classified addenda if necessary.

SEC. 125. FOREIGN MILITARY SALES FOR JORDAN.

(a) MIDDLE EAST PEACE.—The foreign military sales financing authorized by this Act for Jordan is provided and increased in the recognition of progress Jordan has made in the search for a just and lasting peace in the Middle East, to encourage further progress, in recognition of the continuing defense needs of Jordan, and in the expectation that Jordan will enter into direct negotiations with Israel based on United Nations Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338 and the Camp David Accords in order to resolve the state of war between those two countries.

(b) SENSE OF CONGRESS.—It is the sense of the Congress that no sales of sophisticated weaponry—specifically advanced aircraft, new air defense weapons systems, or other new advanced military weapons systems—be made to Jordan unless the Government of Jordan is publicly committed to the recognition of Israel and to prompt entry into direct peace negotiations with Israel.

SEC. 126. CERTIFICATION CONCERNING AWACS SOLD TO SAUDI ARABIA.

(a) THE PRESIDENT'S 1981 AWACS COMMUNICATION TO THE SENATE.—(1) The Congress finds that in his October 28, 1981, communication to the Senate concerning the proposed sale of AWACS aircraft and F-15 enhancement items to Saudi Arabia which was then being reviewed by the Congress (hereafter in this section referred to as the "1981 AWACS communication"), the President stated the following:

"Transfer of the AWACS will take place . . . only after the Congress has received in writing a Presidential certification, containing agreements with Saudi Arabia, that the following conditions have been met:

"1. Security of Technology

"A. That a detailed plan for the security of equipment, technology, information, and supporting documentation has been agreed to by the United States and Saudi Arabia and is in place; and

"B. The security provisions are no less stringent than measures employed by the U.S. for protection and control of its equipment of like kind outside the continental U.S.; and

"C. The U.S. has the right of continual on-site inspection and surveillance by U.S. personnel of security arrangements for all operations during the useful life of the AWACS. It is further provided that security arrangements will be supplemented by additional U.S. personnel if it is deemed necessary by the two parties; and

"D. Saudi Arabia will not permit citizens of third nations either to perform maintenance on the AWACS or to modify any such equipment without prior, explicit mutual consent of the two governments; and

"E. Computer software, as designated by the U.S. Government, will remain the property of the USG.

"2. Access to Information

"That Saudi Arabia has agreed to share with the United States continuously and completely the information that it acquires from use of the AWACS.

"3. Control Over Third-Country Participation

"A. That Saudi Arabia has agreed not to share access to AWACS equipment, technology, documentation, or any information developed from such equipment or technology with any nation other than the U.S. without the prior, explicit mutual consent of both governments; and

"B. There are in place adequate and effective procedures requiring the screening and security clearance of citizens of Saudi Arabia and that only cleared Saudi citizens and cleared U.S. nationals will have access to AWACS equipment, technology, or documentation, or information derived therefrom, without the prior, explicit mutual consent of the two governments.

"4. AWACS Flight Operations

"That the Saudi AWACS will be operated solely within the boundaries of Saudi Arabia, except with the prior, explicit mutual consent of the two governments, and solely for defensive purposes as defined by the United States, in order to maintain security and regional stability.

"5. Command Structure

"That agreements as they concern organizational command and control structure for the operation of AWACS are of such a nature to guarantee that the commitments above will be honored.

"6. Regional Peace and Security

"That the sale contributes directly to the stability and security of the area, enhances the atmosphere and prospects for progress toward peace, and that initiatives toward the peaceful resolution of disputes in the region have either been successfully completed or that significant progress toward that goal has been accomplished with the substantial assistance of Saudi Arabia.".

(2) The Congress finds that the President also stated in the 1981 AWACS communication that should circumstances arise that might require changes in the arrangements described in that communication, "they would be made only with Congressional participation".

(b) REQUIREMENT FOR PRESIDENTIAL CERTIFICATION.—As provided in the 1981 AWACS communication, before the E-3A airborne warning and control system (AWACS) aircraft which were the subject of that communication are transferred to Saudi Arabia, the President shall submit to the Congress a written Presidential certification, containing agreements with Saudi Arabia, that the conditions set forth in that communication have been met.

(c) CONGRESSIONAL PARTICIPATION IN CHANGES IN AWACS ARRANGEMENTS.—In order to facilitate the congressional participation provided for in the 1981 AWACS communication, the President shall notify the Congress promptly of any changes being considered by the United States in the arrangements described in that communication.

SEC. 127. COOPERATIVE AGREEMENTS ON AIR DEFENSE IN CENTRAL EUROPE.

(a) GENERAL AUTHORITIES.—The Secretary of Defense may carry out the European air defense agreements. In carrying out those agreements, the Secretary—

(1) may provide without monetary charge to the Federal Republic of Germany articles and services as specified in the agreements; and

(2) may accept from the Federal Republic of Germany (in return for the articles and services provided under paragraph (1)) articles and services as specified in the agreements.

(b) SPECIAL AUTHORITIES.—In connection with the administration of the European air defense agreements, the Secretary of Defense may—

(1) waive any surcharge for administrative services otherwise chargeable under section 21(e)(1)(A) of the Arms Export Control Act;

(2) waive any charge not otherwise waived for services associated with contract administration for the sale under the Arms Export Control Act of Patriot air defense missile fire units to the Federal Republic of Germany contemplated in the agreements;

(3) use, to the extent contemplated in the agreements, the NATO Maintenance and Supply Agency—

(A) for the supply of logistical support in Europe for the Patriot missile system, and

(B) for the acquisition of such logistical support, to the extent that the Secretary determines that the procedures of that Agency governing such supply and acquisition are appropriate;

(4) share, to the extent contemplated in the agreements, the costs of set-up charges of facilities for use by that Agency to perform depot-level support of Patriot missile fire units in Europe; and

(5) deliver to the Federal Republic of Germany one Patriot missile fire unit configured for training, to be purchased by the Federal Republic of Germany under the Arms Export Control Act as contemplated in the agreements, without regard to the requirement in section 22 of that Act for payment in advance of delivery for any purchase under that Act.

(c) RATE CHARGED FOR CERTAIN SERVICES.—Notwithstanding the rate required to be charged under section 21 of the Arms Export Control Act for services furnished by the United States, in the case of 14 Patriot missile fire units which the Federal Republic of Germany purchases from the United States under the Arms Export Control Act as contemplated in the European air defense agreements, the rate charged by the Secretary of Defense for packing, crating, handling, and transportation services associated with that purchase may not exceed the established Department of Defense rate for such services.

(d) LIMITATION ON CONTRACT AUTHORITY.—The authority of the Secretary of Defense to enter into contracts under the European air defense agreements is available only to the extent that appropriated funds, other than those made available under section 31 of the Arms Export Control Act, are available for that purpose.

(e) RELATION TO FY 1985 AUTHORIZATION.—The authorities provided by this section are an extension of, and not in addition to, the authorities provided by section 1007 of the Department of Defense Authorization Act, 1985 (98 Stat. 2579), relating to the authority of the Secretary of Defense to carry out the European air defense agreements during fiscal year 1985.

(f) DEFINITION OF EUROPEAN AIR DEFENSE AGREEMENTS.—For the purposes of this section, the term "European air defense agreements" means—

(1) the agreement entitled "Agreement between the Secretary of Defense of the United States of America and the Minister of Defense of the Federal Republic of Germany on Cooperative Measures for Enhancing Air Defense for Central Europe," signed on December 6, 1983; and

(2) the agreement entitled "Agreement between the Secretary of Defense of the United States of America and the Minister of Defense of the Federal Republic of Germany in implementation of the 6 December 1983 Agreement on Cooperative Measures for Enhancing Air Defense for Central Europe," signed on July 12, 1984.

SEC. 128. CEILING ON MILITARY ASSISTANCE FOR TURKEY.

For each of the fiscal years 1986 and 1987, the aggregate total of assistance under chapter 2 of part II of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 and financing under the Arms Export Control Act provided for Turkey may not exceed $711,428,570.

TITLE II—ECONOMIC SUPPORT FUND

SEC. 201. AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.

(a) AUTHORIZATIONS.—Section 531(b)(1) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 is amended to read as follows:

"(b)(1) There are authorized to be appropriated to the President to carry out the purposes of this chapter $3,830,400,000 for fiscal year 1986 and $3,830,400,000 for fiscal year 1987. In addition to the amount appropriated by Public Law 98-473, there are authorized to be appropriated to the President to carry out this chapter $1,500,000,000 for fiscal year 1985, which shall be available only for Israel.".

(b) REPEAL OF PRIOR YEAR PROVISIONS.—Chapter 4 of part II of such Act is amended by repealing existing sections 532, 533, 534, 536, 537, 538, 539, and 540.

(c) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendment made by subsection (a) shall take effect on the date of enactment of this Act.

SEC. 202. EMERGENCY ASSISTANCE.

Section 535 of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 is amended—

(1) by striking out "1982" and "1983" inserting in lieu thereof "1986" and "1987", respectively; and

(2) by redesignating that section as section 532.

SEC. 203. ASSISTANCE FOR THE MIDDLE EAST.

(a) ISRAEL.—

(1) EARMARKINGS FOR ISRAEL.—Of the amounts authorized to be appropriated to carry out chapter 4 of part II of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, not less than $1,200,000,000 for fiscal year 1986 and not less than $1,200,000,000 for fiscal year 1987 shall be available only for Israel.

(2) CASH TRANSFERS TO ISRAEL.—The total amounts of funds allocated for Israel under chapter 4 of part II of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 for fiscal year 1986 and fiscal year 1987 shall be made available as a cash transfer on a grant basis. Such transfer shall be made on an expedited basis in the first 30 days of the respective fiscal year or within 30 days after the date of enactment of this Act, whichever date is later. In exercising the authority of this paragraph, the President shall ensure that the level of cash transfer made to Israel does not cause an adverse impact on the total level of nonmilitary exports from the United States to Israel.

(b) EGYPT.—

(1) EARMARKINGS FOR EGYPT.—Of the amounts authorized to be appropriated to carry out chapter 4 of part II of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, not less than $815,000,000 for fiscal year 1986 and not less than $815,000,000 for fiscal year 1987 shall be available only for Egypt.

(2) CASH TRANSFERS TO EGYPT.—Amounts authorized to be appropriated to carry out chapter 4 of part II of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 which are allocated for assistance for Egypt for fiscal year 1986 and fiscal year 1987 may be provided as a cash transfer only if—

(A) the President determines that Eygpt will undertake economic reforms or development activities which are additional to those which would be undertaken in the absence of the cash transfer, and

(B) at least 15 days before the cash transfer occurs, the President notifies the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate in accordance with the procedures applicable to reprograming notifications pursuant to section 634A of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, such notification to include a description of the additional economic reforms or development activities Egypt will undertake.

(c) COOPERATIVE SCIENTIFIC AND TECHNOLOGICAL PROJECTS.—It is the sense of the Congress that, in order to continue to build the structure of peace in the Middle East, the United States should finance, and where appropriate participate in, cooperative projects of a scientific and technological nature involving Israel and Egypt and other Middle East countries wishing to participate. These cooperative projects should include projects in the fields of agriculture, health, energy, the environment, education, water resources, and the social sciences.

SEC. 204. ASSISTANCE FOR CYPRUS.

(a) FISCAL YEARS 1986 AND 1987.—Of the amounts authorized to be appropriated to carry out chapter 4 of part II of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, not less than $15,000,000 for fiscal year 1986 and not less than $15,000,000 for fiscal year 1987 shall be available only for Cyprus.

(b) CYPRUS PEACE AND RECONSTRUCTION FUND.—

(1) AUTHORIZATION.—In addition to amounts otherwise available for assistance for Cyprus under chapter 4 of part II of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, there is authorized to be appropriated $250,000,000 for fiscal year 1985 to provide assistance for Cyprus, subject to paragraph (2).

(2) CERTIFICATION REQUIRED.—The additional assistance for Cyprus authorized by paragraph (1) may be provided only if the President certifies to the Congress that an agreement has been concluded by the Greek and Turkish Cypriots which is supported by Greece and Turkey and which achieves substantial progress toward settlement of the Cyprus dispute. Such an agreement should include an agreement on Varosha/Famagusta, foreign troop levels in the Republic of Cyprus, the disposition of the international airport on Cyprus, or other significant steps which are evidence of substantial progress toward an overall settlement of the Cyprus dispute.

(3) EXTENDED AVAILABILITY OF FUNDS.—Funds authorized to be appropriated by paragraph (1) may be appropriated in subsequent fiscal years if not appropriated for fiscal year 1985, and when appropriated shall remain available until expended.

SEC. 205. RESTRICTION ON USE OF FUNDS FOR NUCLEAR FACILITIES.

Funds authorized to be appropriated to carry out chapter 4 of part II of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 for fiscal year 1986 or fiscal year 1987 may not be used to finance the construction of, the operation or maintenance of, or the supplying of fuel for, any nuclear facility in a foreign country unless the President certifies to the Congress that such country is a party to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons or the Treaty for the Prohibition of Nuclear Weapons in Latin America (the "Treaty of Tlatelolco"), cooperates fully with the International Atomic Energy Agency, and pursues nonproliferation policies consistent with those of the United States.

TITLE III—DEVELOPMENT ASSISTANCE

SEC. 301. DEVELOPMENT ASSISTANCE POLICY.

Section 102(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraphs:

"(13) United States encouragement of policy reforms is necessary if developing countries are to achieve economic growth with equity.

"(14) Development assistance should, as a fundamental objective, promote private sector activity in open and competitive markets in developing countries, recognizing such activity to be a productive and efficient means of achieving equitable and long term economic growth.

"(15) United States cooperation in development should recognize as essential the need of developing countries to have access to appropriate technology in order to improve food and water, health and housing, education and employment, and agriculture and industry.

"(16) United States assistance should focus on establishing and upgrading the institutional capacities of developing countries in order to promote long term development. An important component of institution building involves training to expand the human resource potential of people in developing countries.".

SEC. 302. AGRICULTURE, RURAL DEVELOPMENT, AND NUTRITION.

Section 103(a)(2) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 is amended by striking out the first sentence and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "There are authorized to be appropriated to the President for purposes of this section, in addition to funds otherwise available for such purposes, $760,551,000 for fiscal year 1986 and $760,551,000 for fiscal year 1987. Of these amounts, the President may use such amounts as he deems appropriate to carry out the provisions of section 316 of the International Security and Development Cooperation Act of 1980.".

SEC. 303. POPULATION AND HEALTH.

Section 104(g) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 is amended to read as follows:

SEC. 310. PROMOTION OF DEMOCRATIC COOPERATIVES.

Section 123 of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(h) The Congress recognizes that, in addition to their role in social and economic development, cooperatives provide an opportunity for people to participate directly in democratic decisionmaking. Therefore, assistance under this chapter shall be provided to rural and urban cooperatives which offer large numbers of low- and middle-income people in developing countries an opportunity to participate directly in democratic decisionmaking. Such assistance shall be designed to encourage the adoption of self-help, private sector cooperative techniques and practices which have been successful in the United States.".

SEC. 311. TARGETED ASSISTANCE.

(a) REQUIREMENTS.—Section 128 of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 128. TARGETED ASSISTANCE.

"(a) DIRECTLY IMPROVING LIVES OF THE POOR MAJORITY.—The President shall use poverty measurement standards, such as those developed by the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, and other appropriate measurements in determining target populations for United States development assistance, and shall strengthen United States efforts to assure that a substantial percentage of development assistance under this chapter directly improves the lives of the poor majority, with special emphasis on those individuals living in absolute poverty.

"(b) ENSURING THAT THE POOR MAJORITY BENEFIT.—To the maximum extent possible, activities under this chapter that attempt to increase the institutional capabilities of private organizations or governments, or that attempt to stimulate scientific and technological research, shall be designed and monitored to ensure that the ultimate beneficiaries of these activities are the poor majority.".

(b) ANNUAL REPORTS.—Section 634(a)(1)(B) of such Act is amended by inserting immediately before the semicolon the following: ", such assessment to include an evaluation of the extent to which programs under chapter 1 of part I directly benefit the poor majority".

SEC. 312. HOUSING AND OTHER GUARANTY PROGRAMS.

(a) INCREASING AUTHORIZED HIG PROGRAM LEVEL.—Section 222(a) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 is amended by striking out "$1,958,000,000" in the second sentence and inserting in lieu thereof "$2,278,000,000".

(b) EXTENDING HIG PROGRAM AUTHORITY.—Such section is further amended by striking out "1986" in the third sentence and inserting in lieu thereof "1988".

(c) MINIMUM ANNUAL HIG PROGRAM LEVELS.—Section 222 of such Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(k) The total principal amount of guaranties issued under this section for each of the fiscal years 1986 and 1987 shall be comparable to the total principal amount of such guaranties issued for fiscal year 1984.".

(d) AGRICULTURAL AND PRODUCTIVE CREDIT AND SELF-HELP COMMUNITY DEVELOPMENT PROGRAMS.—Section 222A(h) of such Act is amended by striking out "1986" and inserting in lieu thereof "1988".

SEC. 313. TRADE CREDIT INSURANCE PROGRAM.

Section 224(e) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 is amended by striking out "not to exceed $300,000,000 in the fiscal year 1985" and inserting in lieu therof "except that the aggregate amount of outstanding commitments under subsection (a) may not exceed $500,000,000 of contingent liability for loan principal during fiscal years 1986 and 1987".

SEC. 314. DISADVANTAGED CHILDREN IN ASIA.

(a) AUTHORIZATION OF ADDITIONAL ASSISTANCE.—Section 241(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 is amended by striking out "$2,000,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$3,000,000".

(b) ADDITIONAL STEPS TO HELP AMERASIAN CHILDREN.—The Congress finds that Amerasian children are currently the object of discrimination in the countries in Asia where they now reside. Therefore the President shall report to the Congress on the quality of life of these children and on what additional steps, such as facilitating adoptions, the United States could take to enhance the lives of these children.

SEC. 315. MINORITY SET-ASIDE.

Except to the extent that the Administrator of the Agency for International Development determines otherwise, not less than 10 percent of the aggregate of the funds made available for each of the fiscal years 1986 and 1987 to carry out chapter 1 of part I of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 shall be made available only for activities of economically and socially disadvantaged enterprises (within the meaning of section 133(c)(5) of the International Development and Food Assistance Act of 1977), historically Black colleges and universities, and private and voluntary organizations which are controlled by individuals who are Black Americans, Hispanic Americans, or Native Americans, or who are economically and socially disadvantaged (within the meaning of section 133(c)(5)(B) and (C) of the International Development and Food Assistance Act of 1977). For purposes of this section, economically and socially disadvantaged individuals shall be deemed to include women.

Assistance under chapter 4 of part II of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 (relating to the economic support fund) may be provided to Bolivia for fiscal years 1986 and 1987 only under the following conditions:

(1) Of the amount of assistance allocated for Bolivia for fiscal year 1986—

(A) up to 25 percent may be provided at any time after the President certifies to the Congress that the Government of Bolivia has enacted legislation which prohibits more than two hectares of coca production per family; and

(B) the remaining 75 percent may be provided at any time subsequent to a certification pursuant to subparagraph (A) if the President certifies to the Congress that the Government of Bolivia achieved the eradication targets for the calendar year 1985 contained in its August 1983 narcotics control agreements with the United States.

(2) Of the amount of assistance allocated for Bolivia for fiscal year 1987—

(A) up to 50 percent may be provided at any time after the President certifies to the Congress that during the first 6 months of calendar year 1986 the Government of Bolivia achieved at least half of the eradication targets for the calendar year 1986 contained in its August 1983 narcotics control agreements with the United States; and

(B) the remaining 50 percent may be provided at any time after the President certifies to the Congress that the Government of Bolivia fully achieved the eradication targets for the calendar year 1986 contained in its August 1983 narcotics control agreements with the United States.

SEC. 510. UPPER HUALLAGA VALLEY PROJECT IN PERU.

Funds authorized to be appropriated for fiscal year 1987 to carry out chapter 1 of part I of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 (relating to development assistance) may be made available for the project of the Agency for International Development in the Upper Huallaga Valley of Peru only if the Administrator of that Agency, after consultation with the Congress, determines that a comprehensive review of that project has been completed which establishes the effectiveness of that project in reducing and eradicating coca leaf production, distribution, and marketing in the Upper Huallaga Valley.

SEC. 511. CONDITIONS ON ESF ASSISTANCE TO JAMAICA.

Of the funds allocated for Jamaica for fiscal year 1986 under chapter 4 of part II of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, $5,000,000 shall be withheld from obligation until the President certifies to the Congress that the Government of Jamaica has prepared, presented, and committed itself to a comprehensive plan or strategy for the control and reduction of illicit cultivation, production, processing, transportation, and distribution of marijuana within a specifically stated period of time.

SEC. 512. REALLOCATION OF FUNDS IF CONDITIONS NOT MET.

If any of the funds described in sections 509, 510, and 511 are not used for the country for which they were allocated because the conditions specified in those sections are not met, the President shall reprogram those funds in order to provide additional assistance to countries which have taken significant steps to halt illicit drug production or trafficking.

SEC. 513. CONDITIONS ON UNITED STATES CONTRIBUTIONS TO THE UNITED NATIONS FUND FOR DRUG ABUSE CONTROL.

Funds authorized to be appropriated by section 482(a) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 (relating to international narcotics control assistance) for fiscal year 1986 and for fiscal year 1987 may be used for a contribution to the United Nations Fund for Drug Abuse Control only if that organization includes in its crop substitution projects a plan for cooperation with the law enforcement forces of the host country.

SEC. 514. NARCOTICS CONTROL EFFORTS IN BRAZIL.

It is the sense of the Congress that the Secretary of State should enter into negotiations with the Government of Brazil in order to establish a bilateral narcotics control agreement. Such agreement should have as a goal a 10 percent reduction in illicit coca production in Brazil in calendar year 1986.

SEC. 515. LATIN AMERICAN REGIONAL NARCOTICS CONTROL ORGANIZATION.

(a) FEASIBILITY STUDY.—The Secretary of State, acting through the Assistant Secretary of State for International Narcotics Matters, shall conduct a study of the feasibility of establishing a regional organization in Latin America which would combat narcotics production and trafficking through regional information-sharing and a regional enforcement unit.

(b) REPORT.—No later than six months after the date of enactment of this Act, the Secretary shall report to the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate on the advisability of encouraging the establishment of such an organization.

SEC. 516. GREATER EFFORT BY UNITED STATES ARMED FORCES TO SUPPORT NARCOTICS CONTROL EFFORTS ABROAD.

No later than 60 days after the date of enactment of this Act, the President shall report to the Congress on why the United States Armed Forces should not exert greater effort in facilitating and supporting interception of narcotics traffickers, and in gathering narcotics-related intelligence, outside the United States.

SEC. 517. CUBAN DRUG TRAFFICKING.

(a) FINDINGS.—The Congress finds that—

(1) the subject of the flow, use, and control of narcotic and psychotropic substances is a matter of great international importance;

(2) the problem of drug abuse and drug trafficking continues to worsen throughout most parts of the world;

(3) the concerns of the governments of many countries have become manifest in several bilateral and multilateral narcotics control projects;

(4) United Nations agencies monitor and apply controls on the flow and use of drugs and coordinate multilateral efforts to control production, trafficking, and abuse of drugs;

(5) the United Nations Fund for Drug Abuse Control funds narcotics projects throughout the world and has been a vehicle since 1971 for multilateral implementation of narcotics control and reduction programs;

(6) the International Narcotics Control Board is charged with monitoring compliance with the Single Convention on Narcotic Drugs, 1961, and the Convention on Psychotropic Substances, and Cuba is a party to both Conventions;

(7) the United Nations Commission on Narcotic Drugs is responsible for formulating policies, coordinating activities, supervising the implementation of international conventions, and making recommendations to governments for international drug control;

(8) the promotion of drug abuse and participation in drug trafficking is universally considered egregious criminal behavior wherever it occurs, whether it occurs locally, nationally, or internationally;

(9) a Federal grand jury of the United States has indicted four prominent Cuban officials on charges of conspiring to smuggle drugs into the United States;

(10) United States Government officials have testified at several congressional hearings that the Government of Cuba is facilitating the flow of illicit drugs into the United States in order to obtain hard currency, support guerrilla/terrorist activities, and undermine United States society; and

(11) such alleged conduct on the part of the Government of Cuba would be injurious to the world community and counter to the general principle of international law that no country has the right to use or permit the use of its territory in such a manner as to injure another country or persons therein.

(b) RECOMMENDED ACTIONS.—It is the sense of the Congress that the President should—

(1) acting through the Permanent Representative of the United States to the United Nations, take such steps as may be necessary to place the question of the involvement by the Government of Cuba in illicit drug trafficking on the agenda of the United Nations;

(2) acting through the Representative of the United States to the Organization of American States, request the Organization of American States to consider this question as soon as possible; and

(3) request other appropriate international organizations and international forums to consider this question.

(c) REPORT.—The President shall report to the Congress on the actions taken pursuant to this section.

TITLE VI—UNITED STATES SCHOLARSHIP PROGRAM FOR DEVELOPING COUNTRIES

SEC. 601. STATEMENT OF PURPOSE.

The purpose of this title is to establish an undergraduate scholarship program designed to bring students of limited financial means from developing countries to the United States for study at United States institutions of higher education.

SEC. 602. FINDINGS AND DECLARATIONS OF POLICY.

The Congress finds and declares that—

(1) it is in the national interest for the United States Government to provide a stable source of financial support to give students in developing countries the opportunity to study in the United States, in order to improve the range and quality of educational alternatives, increase mutual understanding, and build lasting links between those countries and the United States;

(2) providing scholarships to foreign students to study in the United States has proven over time to be an effective means of creating strong bonds between the United States and the future leadership of developing countries and, at the same time, assists countries substantially in their development efforts;

(3) study in United States institutions by foreign students enhances trade and economic relationships by providing strong English language skills and establishing professional and business contacts;

(4) students from families of limited financial means have, in the past, largely not had the opportunity to study in the United States, and scholarship programs sponsored by the United States have made no provision for identifying, preparing, or supporting such students for study in the United States;

(5) it is essential that the United States citizenry develop its knowledge and understanding of the developing countries and their languages, cultures, and socio-economic composition as these areas assume an ever larger role in the world community;

(6) the number of United States Government-sponsored scholarships for students in developing countries has been exceeded as much as twelve times in a given year by the number of scholarships offered by Soviet-bloc governments to students in developing countries, and this disparity entails the serious long-run cost of having so many of the potential future leaders of the developing world educated in Soviet-bloc countries;

(7) an undergraduate scholarship program for students of limited financial means from developing countries to study in the United States would complement current assistance efforts in the areas of advanced education and training of people of developing countries in such disciplines as are required for planning and implementation of public and private development activities; and

(8) the National Bipartisan Commission on Central America has recommended a program of 10,000 United States Government-sponsored scholarships to bring Central American students to the United States, which program would involve careful targeting to encourage participation by young people from all social and economic classes, would maintain existing admission standards by providing intensive English and other training, and would encourage graduates to return to their home countries after completing their education.

SEC. 603. SCHOLARSHIP PROGRAM AUTHORITY.

(a) IN GENERAL.—The President, acting through the United States Information Agency, shall provide scholarships (including partial assistance) for undergraduate study at United States institutions of higher education by citizens and nationals of developing countries who have completed their secondary education and who would not otherwise have an opportunity to study in the United States due to financial limitations.

(b) FORM OF SCHOLARSHIP; FORGIVENESS OF LOAN REPAYMENT.—Scholarships pursuant to this title shall be in the form of grants and loans. To encourage students to use their training in their countries of origin, half of each payment to a student shall be in the form of a loan with repayment to be forgiven upon the student's prompt return to his or her country of origin for a period which is at least one year longer than the period spent studying in the United States.

(c) CONSULTATION.—Before allocating any of the funds made available to carry out this title, the President shall consult with United States institutions of higher education, educational exchange organizations, United States missions in developing countries, and the governments of participating countries on how to implement the guidelines specified in section 604.

(d) DEFINITION.—For purposes of this title, the term "institution of higher education" has the same meaning as given to such term by section 1201(a) of the Higher Education Act of 1965.

SEC. 604. GUIDELINES.

The scholarship program under this title shall be carried out in accordance with the following guidelines:

(1) Consistent with section 112(b) of the Mutual Educational and Cultural Exchange Act of 1961, all programs created pursuant to this title shall be nonpolitical and balanced, and shall be administered in keeping with the highest standards of academic integrity.

(2) United States missions shall design ways to identify promising students who are in secondary educational institutions, or who have completed their secondary education, for study in the United States. In carrying out this paragraph, the United States mission in a country shall consult with Peace Corps volunteers and staff assigned to that country and with private and voluntary organizations with a proven record of providing development assistance to developing countries.

(3) United States missions shall develop and strictly implement specific economic need criteria. Scholarships under this title may only be provided to students who meet the economic need criteria.

(4) The program shall utilize educational institutions in the United States and in developing countries to help participants in the programs acquire necessary skills in English and other appropriate education training.

(5) Each participant from a developing country shall be selected on the basis of academic and leadership potential and the economic, political, and social development needs of such country. Such needs shall be determined by each United States mission in consultation with the government of the respective country. Scholarship opportunities shall emphasize fields that are critical to the development of the participant's country, including agriculture, civil engineering, communications, social science, education, public and business administration, health, nutrition, environmental studies, population and family planning, and energy.

(6) The program shall be flexible in order to take advantage of different training and educational opportunities offered by universities, postsecondary vocational training schools, and community colleges in the United States.

(7) The program shall be flexible with respect to the number of years of undergraduate education financed but in no case shall students be brought to the United States for a period less than one year.

(8) Adequate allowance shall be made in the scholarship for the purchase of books and related educational material relevant to the program of study.

(9) Further allowance shall be made to provide adequate opportunities for professional, academic, and cultural enrichment for scholarship recipients.

(10) The program shall, to the maximum extent practicable, offer equal opportunities for both male and female students to study in the United States.

SEC. 605. AUTHORITY TO ENTER INTO AGREEMENTS.

The President may enter into agreements with foreign governments in furtherance of the purposes of this title. Such agreements may provide for the creation or continuation of binational or multinational educational and cultural foundations and commissions for the purposes of administering programs under this title.

SEC. 606. POLICY REGARDING OTHER INTERNATIONAL EDUCATIONAL PROGRAMS.

(a) AID-FUNDED PROGRAMS.—The Congress urges the administrator of the agency primarily responsible for administering part I of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, in implementing programs authorized under that part, to increase assistance for undergraduate scholarships for students of limited financial means from developing countries to study in the United States at United States institutions of higher education. To the maximum extent practicable, such scholarship assistance shall be furnished in accordance with the guidelines contained in section 604 of this title.

(b) USIA-FUNDED POSTGRADUATE STUDY IN THE UNITED STATES.—The Congress urges the Director of the United States Information Agency to expand opportunities for students of limited financial means from developing countries to receive financial assistance for postgraduate study at United States institution of higher education.

(c) STUDY BY AMERICANS IN DEVELOPING COUNTRIES.—The Congress urges the President to take such steps as are necessary to expand the opportunities for Americans from all economic classes to study in developing countries.

SEC. 607. ESTABLISHMENT AND MAINTENANCE OF COUNSELING SERVICES.

(a) COUNSELING SERVICES ABROAD.—For the purpose of assisting foreign students in choosing fields of study, selecting appropriate institutions of higher education, and preparing for their stay in the United States, the President may make suitable arrangements for counseling and orientation services abroad.

(b) COUNSELING SERVICES IN THE UNITED STATES.—For the purposes of assisting foreign students in making the best use of their opportunities while attending United States institutions of higher education, and assisting such students in directing their talents and initiative into channels which will make them more effective leaders upon return to their native lands, the President may make suitable arrangements (by contract or otherwise) for the establishment and maintenance of adequate counseling services at United States institutions of higher education which are attended by foreign students.

SEC. 608. BOARD OF FOREIGN SCHOLARSHIPS.

The Board of Foreign Scholarships shall advise and assist the President in the discharge of the scholarship program carried out pursuant to this title, in accordance with the guidelines set forth in section 604. The President may provide for such additional secretarial and staff assistance for the Board as may be required to carry out this title.

SEC. 609. GENERAL AUTHORITIES.

(a) PUBLIC AND PRIVATE SECTOR CONTRIBUTIONS.—The public and private sectors in the United States and in the developing countries shall be encouraged to contribute to the costs of the scholarship program financed under this title.

(b) UTILIZATION OF RETURNING PROGRAM PARTICIPANTS.—The President shall seek to engage the public and private sectors of developing countries in programs to maximize the utilization of recipients of scholarships under this title upon their return to their own countries.

(c) PROMOTION ABROAD OF SCHOLARSHIP PROGRAM.—The President may provide for publicity and promotion abroad of the scholarship program provided for in this title.

(d) INCREASING UNITED STATES UNDERSTANDING OF DEVELOPING COUNTRIES.—The President shall encourage United States institutions of higher education, which are attended by students from developing countries who receive scholarships under this title, to provide opportunities for United States citizens attending those institutions to develop their knowledge and understanding of the developing countries, and the languages and cultures of those countries, represented by those foreign students.

(e) OTHER ACTIVITIES TO PROMOTE IMPROVED UNDERSTANDING.—Funds allocated by the United States Information Agency, or the agency primarily responsible for carrying out part I of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, for scholarships in accordance with this title shall be available to enhance the educational training and capabilities of the people of Latin America and the Caribbean and to promote better understanding between the United States and Latin America and the Caribbean through programs of cooperation, study, training, and research. Such funds may be used for program and administrative costs for institutions carrying out such programs.

SEC. 610. ENGLISH TEACHING, TEXTBOOKS, AND OTHER TEACHING MATERIALS.

Wherever adequate facilities or materials are not available to carry out the purposes of paragraph (4) of section 604 in the participant's country and the President determines that the purposes of this title are best served by providing the preliminary training in the participant's country, the President may (by purchase, contract, or other appropriate means) provide the necessary materials and instructors to achieve such purpose.

SEC. 611. REPORTING REQUIREMENT.

Not later than February 1 each year, the President shall submit to the Congress a report on the activities carried on and expenditures made pursuant to this title during the preceding fiscal year.

SEC. 612. FUNDING OF SCHOLARSHIPS FOR FY 1986 AND FY 1987.

(a) CENTRAL AMERICAN UNDERGRADUATE SCHOLARSHIP PROGRAM.—The undergraduate scholarship program financed by the United States Information Agency for students from Central America for fiscal year 1986 and fiscal year 1987 shall be conducted in accordance with this title.

(b) SCHOLARSHIPS FOR STUDENTS FROM OTHER DEVELOPING COUNTRIES.—Any funds appropriated to the United States Information Agency for fiscal year 1986 or fiscal year 1987 for any purpose (other than funds appropriated for educational exchange programs under section 102(a)(1) of the Mutual Educational and Cultural Exchange Act of 1961) may be used to carry out this title with respect to students from developing countries outside Central America.

SEC. 613. COMPLIANCE WITH CONGRESSIONAL BUDGET ACT.

Any authority provided by this title to enter into contracts shall be effective only—

(1) to the extent that the budget authority for the obligation to make outlays, which is created by the contract, has been provided in advance by an appropriation Act; or

(2) to the extent or in such amounts as are provided in advance in appropriation Acts.

TITLE VII—LATIN AMERICA AND THE CARIBBEAN

SEC. 701. STATEMENTS OF POLICY CONCERNING CENTRAL AMERICA.

(a) FINDINGS.—The Congress finds that—

(1) the building of democracy, the restoration of peace, the improvement of living conditions, and the application of equal justice under law in Central America are important to the interests of the United States and the community of American States; and

(2) the interrelated issues of social and human progress, economic growth, political reform, and regional security must be effectively dealt with to assure a democratic and economically and politically secure Central America.

(b) PRIMARY ROLE OF THE PEOPLE AND GOVERNMENTS OF CENTRAL AMERICA.—The achievement of democracy, respect for human rights, peace, and equitable economic growth depends primarily on the cooperation and the human and economic resources of the people and governments of Central America.

(c) UNITED STATES POLICY.—The Congress recognizes that the United States can make a significant contribution to such peaceful and democratic development through a consistent and coherent policy which includes a long-term commitment of assistance. This policy should be designed to support actively—

(1) democracy and political reform, including opening the political process to all members of society;

(2) full observance of internationally recognized human rights, including free elections, freedom of the press, freedom of association, and the elimination of all human rights abuses;

(3) leadership development, including training and educational programs to improve public administration and the administration of justice;

(4) land reform, reform in tax systems, encouragement of private enterprise and individual initiative, creation of favorable investment climates, curbing corruption where it exists, and spurring balanced trade;

(5) the establishment of the rule of law and an effective judicial system; and

(6) the termination of extremist violence by both the left and the right, as well as vigorous action to prosecute those guilty of crimes and the prosecution to the extent possible of past offenders.

This policy should also promote equitable economic growth and development, including controlling the flight of capital and the effective use of foreign assistance and adhering to approved programs for economic stabilization and fiscal responsibility. Finally, this policy should foster dialogue and negotiations (A) to achieve peace based upon the objectives of democratization, reduction of armament, an end to subversion, and the withdrawal of foreign military forces and advisers, and (B) to provide a security shield against violence and intimidation.

(d) UNITED STATES ASSISTANCE PROGRAMS.—The Congress finds, therefore, that the people of the United States are willing to sustain and expand a program of economic and military assistance in Central America if the recipient countries can demonstrate progress toward and a commitment to these goals.

(e) PEACE PROCESS IN CENTRAL AMERICA.—The Congress—

(1) strongly supports the initiatives taken by the Contadora group and the resulting Document of Objectives which has been agreed to by Costa Rica, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras, and Nicaragua and which sets forth a framework for negotiating a peaceful settlement to the conflict and turmoil in the region;

(2) finds that the United States should provide such assistance and support as may be appropriate in helping to reach comprehensive and verifiable final agreements, based on the Document of Objectives, which will ensure peaceful and enduring solutions to the Central American conflicts;

(3) strongly supports national reconciliation in Nicaragua and the creation of a framework for negotiating a peaceful settlement to the Nicaraguan conflict; and

(4) finds that the United States should, in assisting efforts to reach comprehensive and verifiable final agreements based on the Contadora Document of Objectives, encourage the Government of Nicaragua to pursue a dialogue with the armed opposition forces and their political representatives for the purposes of achieving an equitable political settlement of the conflict, including free and fair elections.

SEC. 702. ASSISTANCE FOR EL SALVADOR.

(a) PRESIDENTIAL REPORTS.—The President may provide military assistance for El Salvador in accordance with subsection (c) if he reports to the Congress the extent to which:

(1) The Government of El Salvador is willing to pursue a dialogue with the armed opposition forces and their political representatives for the purposes of achieving an equitable political settlement of the conflict, including free and fair elections.

(2) The elected civilian government is in control of the Salvadoran military and security forces, and those forces are complying with applicable rules of international law and with Presidential directives pertaining to the protection of civilians during combat operations, including Presidential directive C-111-03-984 (relating to aerial fire support).

(3) The Government of El Salvador made demonstrated progress during the preceding 6 months in ending the activities of the death squads.

(4) The Government of El Salvador made demonstrated progress during the preceding 6 months in establishing an effective judicial system. Among the criteria the President shall use in making this determination are—

(A) whether the commission proposed by the President of El Salvador to investigate human rights cases has been established, funded, and given sufficient investigative powers, and whether the evidence that commission collects may be used in the Salvadoran judicial process; and

(B) whether that commission has issued a comprehensive report with regard to its investigation of all Americans murdered in El Salvador.

(5) The Government of El Salvador made demonstrated progress during the preceding 6 months in implementing the land reform program.

(b) REPORTING DATES.—The first report pursuant to subsection (a) shall be submitted on or after October 1, 1985, the second on or after April 1, 1986, the third on or after October 1, 1986, and the fourth on or after April 1, 1987. The reporting requirements pursuant to subsection (a) supersede the reporting requirements with respect to El Salvador contained in the last proviso in the paragraph under the heading "Military Assistance" in Public Law 98-332.

(c) ALLOCATIONS OF MILITARY ASSISTANCE.—Of the aggregate amount of military assistance allocated for El Salvador—

(1) half for fiscal year 1986 may be provided only after the first report pursuant to this section;

(2) the other half for the fiscal year 1986 may be provided only after the second such report;

(3) half for fiscal year 1987 may be provided only after the third such report; and

(4) the other half for fiscal year 1987 may be provided only after the fourth such report.

(d) PROVISION OF ASSISTANCE IN AN EMERGENCY.—Notwithstanding subsection (c), in the event of an emergency certified by the President, funds for military assistance for El Salvador for the second half of fiscal year 1986 or 1987 may be provided in the first half of that fiscal year only if the Congress is notified at least 15 days in advance of the proposed obligation of such funds.

(e) AIRCRAFT FOR AERIAL WARFARE.—

(1) NOTIFICATION TO THE CONGRESS.—The authorities of part II of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 and the Arms Export Control Act may not be used to make available to El Salvador any helicopters or other aircraft, and licenses may not be issued under section 38 of the Arms Export Control Act for the export to El Salvador of any such aircraft, unless the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate are notified at least 15 days in advance in accordance with the procedures applicable to reprogramming notifications under section 634A of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961.

(2) EFFECTIVE DATE.—Paragraph (1) shall take effect on the date of enactment of this Act and shall remain in effect until October 1, 1987.

(f) ECONOMIC SUPPORT ASSISTANCE.—

(1) CENTRAL RESERVE BANK REFORMS.—Before disbursing any assistance to the Government of El Salvador under chapter 4 of part II of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 for balance-of-payments support, the President shall be satisfied that the Central Reserve Bank of El Salvador has implemented or has taken appropriate steps toward implementing the major recommendations which are contained in the study entitled "Foreign Exchange: Policy and Management within the Central Reserve Bank of El Salvador", relating to management, allocation, and controls on the use of official foreign exchange.

(2) BALANCE-OF-PAYMENTS SUPPORT.—Funds authorized to be appropriated for fiscal years 1986 and 1987 to carry out chapter 4 of part II of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 which are provided to El Salvador for balance-of-payments support—

(A) shall be used solely for the purchase of materials essential for productive economic activity and development, with particular emphasis and priority on the import needs of agrarian reform and the agricultural sector; and

(B) shall be maintained in a separate account in the Central Reserve Bank of El Salvador and not commingled with any other funds.

Those funds may be obligated and expended notwithstanding provisions of law which are inconsistent with the cash transfer nature of the assistance or which are referenced in the Joint Explanatory Statement of the Committee of Conference accompanying House Joint Resolution 648 of the 98th Congress (House Report 98-1159).

(3) SPECIAL ACCOUNT FOR LOCAL CURRENCIES.—All local currencies generated with the funds described in paragraph (2) shall be deposited in accordance with section 609 of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 in a special account established by the Government of El Salvador. Those local currencies shall be used for projects assisting agrarian reform and the agricultural sector (and particular emphasis shall be placed on projects for these purposes); judicial reform; employment generation; health, education, and other social services; infrastructure repair; and credits and other support for the private sector (principally for small and medium sized businesses).

(g) SUSPENSION OF ASSISTANCE IF A MILITARY COUP OCCURS.—All assistance authorized by this Act which is allocated for El Salvador shall be suspended if the elected President of that country is deposed by military coup or decree.

(h) DEFINITIONS.—For purposes of this section—

(1) the term "military assistance" means any assistance under chapter 2 (relating to grant military assistance) or chapter 5 (relating to international military education and training) of part II of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 or under the Arms Export Control Act (relating to foreign military sales financing);

(2) the term "agrarian reform" means projects assisting or enhancing the abilities of agencies, cooperatives, and farms to implement land reform decrees in El Salvador, notwithstanding section 620(g) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961; and

(3) the term "judicial reform" means projects assisting or enhancing the abilities of agencies of the Salvadoran Government to investigate and prosecute politically motivated violence.

SEC. 703. ASSISTANCE FOR GUATEMALA.

(a) CONDITIONS ON MILITARY ASSISTANCE AND SALES.—For fiscal years 1986 and 1987, assistance may be provided for Guatemala under chapter 2 (relating to grant military assistance) or chapter 5 (relating to international military education and training) of part II of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 and sales may be made and financing may be provided for Guatemala under the Arms Export Control Act (relating to foreign military sales) only if the President makes the following certifications to the Congress:

(1) For fiscal year 1986, an elected civilian government is in power in Guatemala and has submitted a formal written request to the United States for the assistance, sales, or financing to be provided.

(2) For both fiscal year 1986 and fiscal year 1987, the Government of Guatemala made demonstrated progress during the preceding year (A) in achieving control over its military and security forces, and (B) toward eliminating kidnappings and disappearances, forced recruitment into the civil defense patrols, and other abuses by such forces of internationally recognized human rights.

(b) CONTINUATION OF IMET PROGRAMS UPON ELECTION.—Notwithstanding subsection (a), up to 30 percent of the amount allocated for Guatemala for fiscal year 1986 for assistance under chapter 5 of part II of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 may be provided, upon the election of a civilian government in Guatemala, for the continuation of existing programs under that chapter.

(c) CONSTRUCTION EQUIPMENT AND MOBILE MEDICAL FACILITIES AND RELATED TRAINING.—If the conditions specified in subsection (a) are met, Guatemala may be provided with the following for fiscal years 1986 and 1987 (in addition to such other assistance, sales, or financing as may be provided for Guatemala):

(1) Sales of construction equipment and mobile medical facilities to assist in development programs that will directly assist the poor in Guatemala.

(2) Sales of training, to be provided outside of Guatemala, which is related to the sales described in paragraph (1).

(3) A total for both fiscal years 1986 and 1987 of no more than $10,000,000 in credits under the Arms Export Control Act for sales described in paragraphs (1) and (2).

Such sales and credits shall be provided only to enable the military forces of Guatemala to obtain equipment and training for civilian engineering and construction projects and mobile medical teams, which would not be used in the rural resettlement program.

(d) PROHIBITION ON FURNISHING WEAPONS.—Funds authorized to be appropriated by title I of this Act may not be used for the procurement by Guatemala of any weapons or ammunition.

(e) SUSPENSION OF ASSISTANCE IF A MILITARY COUP OCCURS.—All assistance authorized by this Act which is allocated for Guatemala shall be suspended if the elected civilian government of that country is deposed by military coup or decree.

(f) RURAL RESETTLEMENT PROGRAM.—Assistance provided for Guatemala for the fiscal year 1986 and fiscal year 1987 under chapter 1 of part I (relating to development assistance) or under chapter 4 of part II (relating to the economic support fund) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961—

(1) may not be provided to the Government of Guatemala for use in its rural resettlement program; and

(2) shall be provided through private and voluntary organizations to the maximum extent possible.

(g) INVITATION FOR ICRC TO VISIT GUATEMALA.—The Congress calls upon the President to urge the Government of Guatemala to allow the International Committee of the Red Cross—

(1) to conduct an unimpeded visit to Guatemala in order to investigate humanitarian needs in that country, and

(2) to investigate the possibilities of its providing humanitarian services in that country.

SEC. 704. PROHIBITION RELATING TO MILITARY OR PARAMILITARY OPERATIONS IN NICARAGUA.

Funds authorized to be appropriated by this Act may not be obligated or expended for the purpose of supporting military or paramilitary operations in Nicaragua by any group, organization, movement, or individual.

SEC. 705. REFUGEES IN HONDURAS.

Funds authorized to be appropriated by this Act or authorized to be appropriated for "Migration and Refugee Assistance" by the Department of State Authorization Act, Fiscal Years 1986 and 1987—

(1) which are to be used for refugee assistance or other assistance for Nicaraguan Indian refugees in Honduras, shall be channelled through the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, the International Committee of the Red Cross, the Intergovernmental Committee for Migration, or other established and recognized international refugee relief organizations; and

(2) may not be used to facilitate the involuntary repatriation of Salvadoran refugees who are in Honduras.

To ensure compliance with paragraph (2), any such funds used to assist in the repatriation of Salvadoran refugees in Honduras shall be made available only for voluntary repatriation activities which are administered or supervised by the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, the International Committee of the Red Cross, the Intergovernmental Committee for Migration, or other established and recognized international refugee relief organizations.

SEC. 706. PROMOTING THE DEVELOPMENT OF THE HAITIAN PEOPLE AND PROVIDING FOR ORDERLY EMIGRATION FROM HAITI.

(a) USE OF PVOs.—To the maximum extent practicable, assistance for Haiti under chapter 1 of part I (relating to development assistance) and under chapter 4 of part II (relating to the economic support fund) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 should be provided through private and voluntary organizations.

(b) CONDITIONS ON ASSISTANCE.—Funds available for fiscal year 1986 and for fiscal year 1987 to carry out chapter 1 of part I (relating to development assistance), chapter 4 of part II (relating to the economic support fund), or chapter 5 of part II (relating to international military education and training) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 may be obligated for Haiti only if the President determines that the Government of Haiti—

(1) is continuing to cooperate with the United States in halting illegal emigration to the United States from Haiti;

(2) is cooperating fully in implementing United States development, food, and other economic assistance programs in Haiti (including programs for prior fiscal years); and

(3) is making progress toward improving the human rights situation in Haiti and progress toward implementing political reforms which are essential to the development of democracy in Haiti, such as progress toward the establishment of political parties, free elections, free labor unions, and freedom of the press.

(c) REPORTS TO THE CONGRESS.—Not later than 6 months after the date of the enactment of this Act and each 6 months thereafter through fiscal year 1987, the President shall report to the Congress on the extent to which the actions of the Government of Haiti are consistent with each paragraph of subsection (b).

(d) ASSISTANCE IN HALTING ILLEGAL EMIGRATION FROM HAITI.—Notwithstanding the limitations of section 660 of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 (relating to police training), funds made available under such Act may be used for programs with Haiti, which shall be consistent with prevailing United States refugee policies, to assist in halting significant illegal emigration from Haiti to the United States.

(e) LIMITATION ON MAP AND FMS FINANCING.—Assistance may not be provided for Haiti for fiscal year 1986 or fiscal year 1987 under chapter 2 of part II of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 (relating to grant military assistance) or under the Arms Export Control Act (relating to foreign military sales financing), except for necessary transportation, maintenance, communications, and related articles and services to enable the continuation of migrant and narcotics interdiction operations.

(f) FUNDING FOR LITERACY PROGRAMS.—Of the amounts authorized to be appropriated to carry out chapter 4 of part II of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 (relating to the economic support fund) which are allocated for Haiti, $1,000,000 for fiscal year 1986 and $1,000,000 for fiscal year 1987 shall be available only for literacy programs in Haiti.

SEC. 707. CONDITIONS ON MILITARY ASSISTANCE FOR PARAGUAY.

None of the funds authorized to be appropriated by title I of this Act may be used for assistance for Paraguay unless the President certifies to the Congress the following:

(1) The Government of Paraguay is cooperating with other governments to determine the whereabouts of Nazi criminal Doctor Joseph Mengele and bring him to justice.

(2) The Government of Paraguay has made demonstrated progress in ending the practice of torture and abuse of individuals held in detention by its military and security forces and has instituted procedures to ensure that those arrested are promptly charged and brought to trial.

SEC. 708. ASSISTANCE FOR PERU.

(a) REPORTS ON HUMAN RIGHTS CONDITIONS.—Upon obligating any funds for assistance for Peru for fiscal year 1986 and fiscal year 1987 under chapter 2 of part II of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 (relating to grant military assistance) or the Arms Export Control Act (relating to foreign military sales financing), the President shall report to the Congress on the steps that the Government of Peru has taken to—

(1) curtail killings, torture, and "disappearances" of civilian noncombatants by the the military and security forces of Peru;

(2) strengthen the ability of the judiciary to investigate such killings, torture, and disappearances;

(3) comply with established procedures to ensure that arrests and detentions by the military and security forces of Peru are immediately acknowledged; and

(4) account for "disappeared persons" in Peru.

(b) HUMAN RIGHTS TRAINING IN IMET PROGRAMS.—Respect for internationally recognized human rights shall be an important component of the training provided for Peru under chapter 5 of part II of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 (relating to international military education and training) for fiscal year 1986 and for fiscal year 1987.

(c) STRENGTHENING THE PERUVIAN JUDICIAL SYSTEM.—Of the amount authorized to be appropriated by this Act to carry out chapter 4 of part II of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 (relating to the economic support fund), $1,000,000 for fiscal year 1986 and $1,000,000 for fiscal year 1987 shall be used to strengthen the judicial system in Peru under section 534 of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 (relating to administration of justice).

SEC. 709. INTER-AMERICAN FOUNDATION.

The first sentence of section 401(s)(2) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1969 is amended to read as follows: "There are authorized to be appropriated $12,000,000 for fiscal year 1986 and $12,000,000 for fiscal year 1987 to carry out the purposes of this section.".

SEC. 710. COMPREHENSIVE REPORTS ON ASSISTANCE FOR LATIN AMERICA AND THE CARIBBEAN.

(a) REQUIREMENT FOR COMPREHENSIVE ACCOUNTING OF ASSISTANCE.—In the annual reports required by section 634 of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, the President shall provide to the Congress a full, complete, and detailed accounting of all assistance provided during the fiscal years 1986 and 1987 for Latin America and the Caribbean under the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 and the Arms Export Control Act.

(b) INFORMATION TO BE INCLUDED.—The report provided pursuant to subsection (a) shall include for each fiscal year, among other things, the following with respect to each authorization account:

(1) The specific projects and other activities carried out in each country.

(2) The number of persons from each country who were provided with training, and the types of training provided.

(3) The defense articles and defense services provided for each country.

(4) The types of goods and commodities provided to each country for economic stabilization purposes under chapter 4 of part II of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 (relating to the economic support fund), and a copy of each agreement for the furnishing of any assistance under that chapter.

(5) The amounts of local currency generated by United States assistance to each country, the uses of those currencies, and the total amount of those currency still available for use as of the time of the report.

(6) A report on any tranfers or reprogrammings of funds, and a description of how tranferred or reprogrammed funds modified the amounts requested for each account.

(7) A report on the funds which have been obligated but remain unexpended for each country in each account.

(8) An analysis of the amount of funds and programs provided through nongovernmental as contrasted to governmental channels.

SEC. 711. ASSISTANCE FOR LAW ENFORCEMENT AGENCIES.

Section 660 of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(c) Subsection (a) shall not apply with respect to a country which has a long-standing democratic tradition, does not have standing armed forces, and does not engage in a consistent pattern of gross violations of internationally recognized human rights.".

SEC. 712. USE OF PRIVATE AND VOLUNTARY ORGANIZATIONS.

To the maximum extent practicable, assistance under chapter 1 of part I (relating to development assistance) and chapter 4 of part II (relating to the economic support fund) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 for countries in Latin America and the Caribbean should be provided through private and voluntary organizations which have a proven record of development assistance efforts overseas.

SEC. 713. ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE.

Chapter 4 of part II of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 (relating to the economic support fund), as amended by title II of this Act, is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"SEC. 533. ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE.

"(a) AUTHORIZATION OF ASSISTANCE.—The President may furnish assistance under this chapter to countries and organizations, including national and regional institutions, in order to strengthen the administration of justice in countries in Latin America and the Caribbean.

"(b) LIMITATIONS ON TYPES OF ASSISTANCE.—Assistance under this section may only include—

"(1) support for specialized professional training, scholarships, and exchanges for continuing legal education;

"(2) programs to enhance prosecutorial and judicial capabilities and protection for participants in judicial cases;

"(3) notwithstanding section 660 of this Act, programs to enhance investigative capabilities, conducted under judicial or prosecutorial control;

"(4) strengthening professional organizations in order to promote services to members and the role of the bar in judicial selection, enforcement of ethical standards, and legal reform;

"(5) increasing the availability of legal materials and publications;

"(6) seminars, conferences, and training and educational programs to improve the administration of justice and to strengthen respect for the rule of law and internationally recognized human rights; and

"(7) revision and modernization of legal codes and procedures.

"(c) AMOUNTS AVAILABLE FOR ASSISTANCE.—Not more than $20,000,000 of the funds made available to carry out this chapter for any fiscal year shall be available to carry out this section, in addition to amounts otherwise available for such purposes.

"(d) NOTIFICATION TO CONGRESS.—Funds may not be obligated for assistance under this section unless the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate are notified of the amount and nature of the proposed assistance at least 15 days in advance in accordance with the procedures applicable to reprogrammings pursuant to section 634A of this Act.

"(e) EXPIRATION OF AUTHORITIES.—The authority of this section shall expire on September 30, 1987.".

SEC. 714. CENTRAL AMERICAN DEVELOPMENT ORGANIZATION.

(a) FINDINGS.—The Congress finds that participation by Central American countries in an effective forum for dialogue on, and the continuous review and advancement of, Central America's political, economic, and social development would foster cooperation between the United States and Central American countries.

(b) ESTABLISHMENT OF CADO.—It is the sense of the Congress that—

(1) the President should enter into negotiations with the countries of Central America to establish a Central American Development Organization (hereafter in this section referred to as the "Organization"); and

(2) the establishment of the Organization should be based upon the following principles:

(A) Participation in the Organization should be open to the United States, other donors, and those Central American countries that commit themselves to, among other things, respecting internationally recognized human rights, building democracy, and encouraging equitable economic growth through policy reforms.

(B) The Organization should be structured to include representatives from both the public and private sectors, including representatives from the labor, agriculture, and business communities.

(C) The Organization should meet periodically to carry out the functions described in subparagraphs (D) and (E) of this paragraph and should be supported by a limited professional secretariat.

(D) The Organization should make recommendations affecting Central American countries on such matters as—

(i) political, economic, and social development objectives, including the strengthening of democratic pluralism and the safeguarding of internationally recognized human rights;

(ii) mobilization of resources and external assistance needs; and

(iii) reform of economic policies and structures.

(E) The Organization should have the capacity for monitoring country performance on the recommendations issued in accordance with subparagraph (D) of this paragraph and for evaluating progress towards meeting such country objectives.

(F) To the maximum extent practicable, the United States should follow the recommendations of the Organization in disbursing bilateral economic assistance for any Central American country; and no more than 75 percent of such United States assistance in any fiscal year should be disbursed until the recommendations of the Organization for that fiscal year have been made final and communicated to the donor countries, but this limitation should apply only to recommendations made final and communicated prior to the fourth quarter of such fiscal year.

(G) The President should encourage other donors similarly to implement the recommendations of the Organization.

(H) The administrator of the agency primarily responsible for administering part I of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, or his designee, should be chairman of the Organization and should carry out his functions in that capacity under the continuous supervision and general direction of the Secretary of State.

(c) U.S. PARTICIPATION IN CADO.—Subject to subsection (d)(3), the President is authorized to participate in the Organization.

(d) CONGRESSIONAL OVERSIGHT.—

(1) DEVELOPMENT OF PROPOSAL.—The Administrator of the Agency for International Development, under the supervision and direction of the Secretary of State, shall prepare a detailed proposal to carry out this section and shall keep the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate fully and currently informed concerning the development of the proposal.

(2) FACILITATING CONGRESSIONAL INVOLVEMENT.—To facilitate full congressional involvement in the establishment of the Organization, the Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives shall designate at least three members of that committee, and the Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate shall designate at least three members of that committee, who shall be kept fully and currently informed by the executive branch of all negotiations or discussions with donor countries and recipient countries concerning the establishment of the Organization.

(3) CONGRESSIONAL REVIEW OF AGREEMENT.—The President shall transmit to the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate a copy of the text of any agreement which he proposes to sign providing for the establishment of and United States participation in the Organization no less than 60 days prior to his signature. The United States shall not participate in the implementation of any such agreement for at least 60 days after such transmittal. During that 60-day period, there shall be full and formal consultations with and review by those committees in accordance with procedures applicable to reprogramming notifications pursuant to section 634A of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961.

SEC. 715. LIMITATION ON INTRODUCTION OF ARMED FORCES INTO CENTRAL AMERICA FOR COMBAT.

(a) FINDINGS.—The Congress makes the following findings:

(1) The President has stated that there is no need to introduce United States Armed Forces into Central America for combat and that he has no intention of doing so.

(2) The President of El Salvador has stated that there is no need for United States Armed Forces to conduct combat operations in El Salvador and that he has no intention of asking that they do so.

(3) The possibility of the introduction of United States Armed Forces into Central America for combat raises very grave concern in the Congress and the American people.

(b) POLICY.—It is the sense of Congress that—

(1) United States Armed Forces should not be introduced into or over the countries of Central America for combat; and

(2) if circumstances change from those present on the date of the enactment of this Act and the President believes that those changed circumstances require the introduction of United States Armed Forces into or over a country of Central America for combat, the President should consult with Congress before any decision to so introduce United States Armed Forces, and any such introduction of United States Armed Forces must comply with the War Powers Resolution.

SEC. 716. MILITARY EXERCISES IN CENTRAL AMERICA.

For fiscal years 1986 and 1987, the President shall notify the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate 30 days in advance of assigning or detailing members of the United States Armed Forces to, or otherwise introducing members of the United States Armed Forces into, any country in Central America for the purpose of commencing joint military exercises with the armed forces of any Central American country.

SEC. 717. INTERNATIONAL ADVISORY COMMISSION FOR THE CARIBBEAN REGION.

(a) FINDINGS.—The Congress finds that—

(1) many of the social, agricultural, educational, and economic problems which confront nations in the Caribbean Region result primarily from social and economic injustice and inadequate economic and agricultural development;

(2) such problems are not addressed sufficiently by current United States policies toward that region;

(3) the development of the Caribbean Region is of vital importance to the economic and strategic interests of the United States and its allies; and

(4) for purposes of defining development plans, providing an international forum for Caribbean Region development issues, and providing expert advice to donor-aid countries, an international commission is needed as the prime institution for promoting economic cooperation and development in the Caribbean Region.

(b) INVITATIONS TO PARTICIPATE IN COMMISSION.—

(1) INVITATION TO CARIBBEAN COUNTRIES.—The President is requested to invite the countries which comprise the Caribbean Region to participate with the United States in a commission to be known as the International Advisory Commission for the Caribbean Region (hereafter in this section referred to as the "Commission").

(2) INVITATION TO CERTAIN OTHER COUNTRIES.—The President is also requested to invite the Netherlands, the United Kingdom, France, Canada, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands to participate in the Commission.

(c) FUNCTIONS OF COMMISSION.—It is the sense of the Congress that the Commission should—

(1) examine social, agricultural, educational, and economic issues which affect the Caribbean Region; and

(2) consult with leaders of the countries in the Caribbean Region and with representatives from public and private organizations involved in matters related to the Caribbean Region in order to evaluate the problems and needs of such countries.

(d) REQUEST TO CONGRESS RELATING TO UNITED STATES PARTICIPATION IN THE COMMISSION.—It is the sense of the Congress that, after conducting preliminary consultations with countries described in subsection (b), the President should provide costs estimates and request authorization from the Congress in order to—

(1) provide for the participation of the United States in the Commission,

(2) pay reasonable administrative expenses associated with the first meeting of the Commission, and

(3) pay reasonable travel and lodging expenses incurred by commissioners from other participant governments incident to their attendance at the first meeting.

(e) APPOINTMENT OF U.S. REPRESENTATIVE AND OBSERVERS.—Upon the creation of the Commission—

(1) the President should consider appointing one individual as the United States representative to the Commission;

(2) the Speaker of the House of Representatives should consider appointing two Members of the House, one from each major political party, as observers at the Commission; and

(3) the Majority Leader of the Senate should consider appointing two Members of the Senate, one from each major political party, as observers at the Commission.

SEC. 718. EXEMPTION OF CERTAIN SAFETY-RELATED EQUIPMENT FROM PROHIBITION ON MILITARY SALES TO CHILE.

Section 726 of the International Security and Development Cooperation Act of 1981 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(c) The prohibition contained in subsection (b) does not prohibit the sale, or the licensing for export, of cartridge actuated devices, propellant actuated devices, and technical manuals for the F-5E/F and A/T-37 aircraft supplied to the Chilean Air Force by the United States before 1974, so long as the items are provided only for purposes of enhancing the safety of the aircraft crew.".

SEC. 719. RURAL ELECTRIFICATION.

It is the sense of the Congress that funds appropriated for the fiscal years 1986 and 1987 under section 103(a)(2) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 should be used for a comprehensive rural electrification program in Central America in order to establish conditions of stability and a foundation for economic development.

SEC. 720. FACILITATING INTERNATIONAL COMMERCE THROUGH MEXICO.

(a) FINDING.—Recognizing that increased levels of balanced international trade are an essential component in an economic development program for the region and that the United States has traditionally been the most important trading partner for each of the nations of Latin America, it is the sense of the Congress that current procedures and laws of the Government of Mexico, and practices of its officials, constitute a significant impediment to the transit of vehicles carrying the commodities of international trade through Mexican territory.

(b) NEGOTIATIONS AND COOPERATIVE STEPS CONCERNING TRANSIT.—As the Government of Mexico has played a valuable role in assisting and encouraging the economic and political development of the region, and in offering advice to the United States as to constructive policies this nation might pursue with respect to peace and prosperity in the area, it is the sense of the Congress that the Secretary of State, acting independently or with representatives of other Latin America nations, should initiate negotiations with the Government of Mexico aimed at eliminating or reducing those impediments to international trade. The agenda for such negotiations should include discussions to encourage the Government of Mexico to accede to existing international custom conventions on international in-transit shipments. Such actions are to be taken in concert with the institution by the United States, and the nations of the region where the transiting shipments originate, of appropriate and cooperative steps to make sealed-truck, no-inspection transit administratively acceptable to the Government of Mexico and other transited countries. Similar bilateral or multilateral negotiations by the Secretary of State with nations respecting the same international customs conventions is also encouraged.

(c) REPORT.—Not later than January 1, 1986, the Secretary of State shall report to the Congress the status of actions taken to carry out the sense of the Congress expressed in subsection (b).

TITLE VIII—AFRICA

SEC. 801. BALANCE-OF-PAYMENTS SUPPORT FOR COUNTRIES IN AFRICA.

(a) ESF COMMODITY IMPORT AND SECTOR PROGRAMS.—Agreements with countries in Africa which provide for the use of funds made available to carry out chapter 4 of part II of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 for the fiscal years 1986 and 1987 to finance imports by those countries (under commodity import programs or sector programs) shall require, to the maximum extent practicable, that those imports be used to meet long-term development needs in those countries in accordance with the following criteria:

(1) Spare parts and other imports shall be allocated on the basis of evaluations, by the agency primarily responsible for administering part I of that Act, of the ability of likely recipients to use such spare parts and imports in a maximally productive, employment generating, and cost effective way.

(2) Imports shall be coordinated with investments in accordance with the recipient country's plans for promoting economic development. The agency primarily responsible for administering part I of that Act shall assess such plans to determine whether they will effectively promote economic development.

(3) Emphasis shall be placed on imports for agricultural activities which will expand agricultural production, particularly activities which expand production for export or to reduce reliance on imported agricultural products.

(4) Emphasis shall also be placed on a distribution of imports having a broad development impact in terms of economic sectors and geographic regions.

(5) In order to maximize the likelihood that the imports financed by the United States under such chapter are in addition to imports which would otherwise occur, consideration shall be given to historical patterns of foreign exchange uses.

(6)(A) Foreign currencies generated by the sale of such imports by the government of the country shall be deposited in a special account established by that government and, except as provided in subparagraph (B), shall be available only for use in accordance with the agreement for economic development activities which are consistent with the policy directions of section 102 of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 and which are the types of activities for which assistance may be provided under section 103 through 106 of that Act.

(B) The agreement shall require that the government of the country make available to the United States Government such portion of the amount deposited in the special account as may be determined by the President to be necessary for requirements of the United States Government.

(b) ANNUAL EVALUATIONS.—The agency primarily responsible for administering part I of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 shall conduct annual evaluations of the extent to which the criteria set forth in this subsection have been met.

SEC. 802. ECONOMIC SUPPORT ASSISTANCE FOR SOUTHERN AFRICA.

(a) SOUTHERN AFRICA REGIONAL PROGRAM.—

(1) FUNDS FOR REGIONAL PROGRAMS.—Of the amounts authorized to be appropriated to carry out chapter 4 of part II of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, $40,000,000 for fiscal year 1986 and $40,000,000 for fiscal year 1987 shall be available only for regional programs in southern Africa. Not less than 50 percent of each of these amounts shall be allocated to assist sector projects supported by the Southern Africa Development Coordination Conference (SADCC) to enhance the economic development of the nine member states forming this important regional institution, especially in the following sectors: transportation, agricultural research and training, manpower development, and institutional support for the SADCC secretariat.

(2) STUDIES.—

(A) EVALUATION OF ASSISTANCE.—The administrator of the agency primarily responsible for administering part I of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 shall conduct a study which evaluates (i) the assistance which that agency provides to the Southern Africa Development Coordination Conference and other African regional institutions and economic development organizations, and (ii) ways to improve such assistance.

(B) COORDINATING MECHANISM IN AID FOR ASSISTANCE.—The administrator shall also conduct a study which assesses what type of bureaucratic mechanism within that agency might be established to coordinate assistance to all African regional institutions.

(C) SUBMISSION TO CONGRESS.—The administrator shall submit the results of the studies conducted pursuant to this paragraph to the Congress within 3 months after the date of enactment of this Act.

(b) SOUTH AFRICA EDUCATIONAL TRAINING PROGRAMS.—Funds available to carry out chapter 4 of part II of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 for fiscal year 1986 and fiscal year 1987 which are used for education or training programs in South Africa may not be used for programs conducted by or through organizations in South Africa which are financed or controlled by the Government of South Africa, such as the "homeland" and "urban council" authorities. Such funds may only be used for programs which in both their character and organizational sponsorship in South Africa clearly reflect the objective of a majority of South Africans for an end to the apartheid system of separate development. Nothing in this subsection shall be construed to prohibit programs which are consistent with this subsection and which award university scholarships to students who choose to attend a South African-supported university.

(c) HUMAN RIGHTS FUND FOR SOUTH AFRICA.—Of the amount allocated for the Human Rights Fund for South Africa under chapter 4 of part II of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 for each of the fiscal years 1986 and 1987, a significant proportion shall be used for assistance for the benefit of political detainees and prisoners and their families and for support for actions of black-led community organizations to resist the implementation of apartheid policies such as—

(1) removal of black populations from certain geographic areas on account of race or ethnic origin,

(2) denationalization of blacks, including any distinctions between the South African citizenships of blacks and whites,

(3) residence restrictions based on race or ethnic origin,

(4) restrictions on the rights of blacks to seek employment in South Africa and to live wherever they find employment in South Africa, and

(5) restrictions which make it impossible for black employees and their families to be housed in family accommodations near their place of employment.

SEC. 803. ECONOMIC ASSISTANCE FOR ZAIRE.

Funds allocated for assistance for Zaire under chapter 4 of part II of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 for each of the fiscal years 1986 and 1987 shall be used only for assistance which is provided in accordance with the provisions applicable to assistance under chapter 1 of part I of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961. Such assistance shall be provided, to the maximum extent practicable, through private and voluntary organizations.

SEC. 804. ASSISTANCE FOR TUNISIA.

(a) POLICY CONCERNING SECURITY ASSISTANCE.—The United States provides security assistance to Tunisia in recognition of the traditional friendship between the United States and Tunisia and our common interests in the region. The provision of such assistance is also based on the expectation that political stability and development in Tunisia will be best advanced through continued growth of democractic institutions.

(b) EARMARKING OF ESF.—Of the amounts authorized to be appropriated to carry out chapter 4 of part II of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, $20,000,000 for fiscal year 1986 and $20,000,000 for fiscal year 1987 shall be available only for Tunisia.

SEC. 805. POLITICAL SETTLEMENT IN SUDAN.

(a) FINDINGS.—The Congress finds that—

(1) friendship and mutual interests bind the United States and Sudan; and

(2) the peace, security, and economic development of Sudan depend in large part on addressing the problems associated with the traditional north-south division in that country through political rather than military means.

(b) UNITED STATES POLICY.—It is, therefore, the policy of the United States that the provision of security assistance to Sudan shall be based on the expectation that the Government of Sudan will make progress toward reaching a political settlement with all parties to the conflict in the south of Sudan.

SEC. 806. ELECTIONS IN LIBERIA.

In recognition of the special relationship that the United States has with Liberia and of the wide variety of interests that the United States has in Liberia, security assistance for Liberia for fiscal years 1986 and 1987 is based on the expectation of a successful completion of free and fair elections, on a multiparty basis, in October 1985 as proposed by the Government of Liberia and on a return to full civilian, constitutional rule as a consequence of those elections.

SEC. 807. WESTERN SAHARA.

(a) UNITED STATES POLICY.—The policy of the United States shall be to support a negotiated political solution to the conflict in the Western Sahara taking into account the principle of self-determination as outlined in the 1981 Nairobi resolution, to encourage a peaceful internationally recognized settlement, and to maintain direct contacts with all the parties to the conflict. As part of this policy, the United States should carefully consider each type of military assistance it furnishes to any of the parties to the conflict and should seek to insure that the furnishing of such military assistance is consistent with United States policy which seeks a negotiated settlement.

(b) FURTHER STATEMENT OF POLICY.—It is the further policy of the United States to support Morocco's legitimate defense needs and to discourage aggression by any country in North Africa against another.

(c) LIMITATION ON ACTIVITIES OF U.S. MILITARY PERSONNEL IN THE WESTERN SAHARA.—Members of the United States Armed Forces may not perform defense services under the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 or the Arms Export Control Act or conduct international military education and training activities under chapter 5 of part II of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 in the Western Sahara so long as there is not an internationally recognized settlement in the Western Sahara.

SEC. 808. SAHEL DEVELOPMENT PROGRAM.

(a) AUTHORIZATIONS OF APPROPRIATIONS.—The third sentence of section 121(c) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 is amended to read as follows: "In addition to the amounts authorized in the preceding sentences and to funds otherwise available for such purposes, there are authorized to be appropriated to the President for purposes of this section $80,500,000 for fiscal year 1986 and $80,500,000 for fiscal year 1987.".

(b) IMPROVING ADMINISTRATIVE CAPABILITIES OF HOST GOVERNMENTS.—Section 121 of such Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(e) Grants shall be made under this section to Sahel Development Program host governments in order to help them enhance their administrative capabilities to meet the administrative requirements resulting from donor country projects and activities.".

SEC. 809. AFRICAN DEVELOPMENT FOUNDATION.

"SEC. 510. AUTHORIZATIONS OF APPROPRIATIONS.

"There are authorized to be appropriated to carry out this title, in addition to amounts otherwise available for that purpose, $1,000,000 for fiscal year 1986 and $1,000,000 for fiscal year 1987. Funds appropriated under this section are authorized to remain available until expended.".

(b) EXTENSION OF AUTHORITIES.—Section 511 of such Act is amended by striking out "1985" and inserting in lieu thereof "1990".

TITLE IX—FOOD AND AGRICULTURAL ASSISTANCE

SEC. 901. INTERNATIONAL FUND FOR AGRICULTURAL DEVELOPMENT.

Section 103(g) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 is amended to read as follows:

"(g)(1) In order to carry out the purposes of this section, the President may continue United States participation in and make contributions to the International Fund for Agricultural Development.

"(2) There are authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to meet the United States pledge for the second replenishment for the International Fund for Agricultural Development.

"(3) Amounts appropriated under this subsection are authorized to remain available until expended.".

SEC. 902. PUBLIC LAW 480 TITLE II MINIMUMS.

(a) MINIMUM AND SUBMINIMUM DISTRIBUTION REQUIREMENTS.—Section 201(b) of the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954 is amended by striking out paragraphs (1) through (3) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(1) for fiscal year 1987 shall be 1,800,000 metric tons, of which not less than 1,300,000 metric tons for nonemergency programs shall be distributed through nonprofit voluntary agencies and the World Food Program;

"(2) for fiscal year 1988 shall be 1,900,000 metric tons, of which not less than 1,400,000 metric tons for nonemergency programs shall be distributed through nonprofit voluntary agencies and the World Food Program; and

"(3) for fiscal year 1989 and each fiscal year thereafter shall be 2,000,000 metric tons, of which not less than 1,500,000 metric tons for nonemergency programs shall be distributed through nonprofit voluntary agencies and the World Food Program;".

(b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendment made by subsection (a) shall take effect on October 1, 1986.

SEC. 903. EXPRESS AUTHORITY FOR TITLE II DIRECT DISTRIBUTION, SALE, AND BARTER.

Section 202(a) of the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954 is amended by inserting after the first sentence the following new sentence: "Such commodities may be furnished for direct distribution, sale, barter, or other appropriate disposition in carrying out the purposes set forth in section 201.".

SEC. 904. ROLE OF PRIVATE VOLUNTARY ORGANIZATIONS AND COOPERATIVES.

(a) NUTRITIONAL AND DEVELOPMENT OBJECTIVES.—Section 202(b) of the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(4) In the case of commodities distributed under this title by nonprofit voluntary agencies, consideration shall be given to nutritional and development objectives as established by those agencies in light of their assessment of the needs of the people assisted.".

(b) FOOD FOR DEVELOPMENT PROGRAMS.—Section 302(c)(4) of such Act is amended by inserting "and of United States nonprofit voluntary agencies and cooperatives" immediately after "agriculture".

SEC. 905. MULTI-YEAR AGREEMENTS WITH PVOS.

Section 202 of the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(c)(1) In agreements with nonprofit voluntary agencies for nonemergency assistance under this title, the President is encouraged, if requested by the nonprofit voluntary agency, to approve multi-year commitments to make agricultural commodities available for distribution by that agency. Such commitment shall be subject to the availability each fiscal year of the necessary appropriations and agricultural commodities.

"(2) Paragraph (1) does not apply to an agreement which the President determines should be limited to a single year because of the past performance of the nonprofit voluntary agency or because the agreement involves a new program of assistance.

"(3) In carrying out a multi-year agreement pursuant to this subsection, a nonprofit voluntary agency shall not be required to obtain annual approval from the United States Government in order to continue its assistance program pursuant to the agreement, unless exceptional and unforeseen circumstances have occurred which the President determines require such approval.".

SEC. 906. CHILD IMMUNIZATION.

(a) AMENDMENTS TO PUBLIC LAW 480.—The Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954 is amended—

(1) in paragraph (11) of section 109 by inserting immediately before the period at the end thereof ", including the immunization of children";

(2) in the first sentence of section 206 by striking out "or" before "(B)", and by inserting immediately before the period at the end thereof ", or (C) health programs and projects, including immunization of children"; and

(3) in the second sentence of section 301(b) by inserting "(including immunization of children)" immediately after "health services".

(b) IMMUNIZATION TARGET.—In the implementation of health programs undertaken in relation to assistance provided under the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954, it shall be the target for the organizations and agencies involved to provide for the immunization by fiscal year 1987 of at least three million more children annually than receive immunizations under such programs in fiscal year 1985. Such increased immunization activities should be taken in coordination with similar efforts of other organizations and in keeping with any national plans for expanded programs of immunization. The President shall include information concerning such immunization activities in the annual reports required by section 634 of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, including a report on the estimated number of immunizations provided each year pursuant to this subsection.

SEC. 907. USE OF LOCAL CURRENCIES FOR EDUCATION PROGRAMS UNDER TITLE III.

Section 301(b) of the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954 is amended by inserting "education," immediately after "nutrition," in the second sentence.

SEC. 908. FARMER-TO-FARMER PROGRAM.

(a) MINIMUM FUNDING LEVEL.—Notwithstanding any other provision of law, not less than one-tenth of 1 percent of the funds available for each of the fiscal years 1986 and 1987 to carry out the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954 shall be used to carry out paragraphs (1) and (2) of section 406(a) of that Act. Any such funds used to carry out paragraph (2) of such section 406(a) shall not constitute more than one-fourth of the funds used pursuant to this subsection, shall be used for activities in direct support of the farmer-to-farmer program under paragraph (1) of such section, and shall be administered wherever possible in conjunction with programs under title XII of chapter 2 of part I of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961.

(b) REPORT.—Not later than 120 days after the enactment of this Act, the Administrator of the Agency for International Development, in conjunction with the Secretary of Agriculture, shall submit to the Congress a report indicating the manner in which the Agency intends to implement the provisions of section 406(a) (1) and (2) of the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954 with the funds made available pursuant to subsection (a) of this section.

SEC. 909. TITLE II PROGRAMING REPORTS.

Section 408(b) of the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954 is amended by striking out "title I" both places it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "titles I and II".

TITLE X—PEACE CORPS

SEC. 1001. AUTHORIZATIONS OF APPROPRIATIONS.

Section 3(b) of the Peace Corps Act is amended by amending the first sentence to read as follows: "There are authorized to be appropriated to carry out the purposes of this Act $124,400,000 for fiscal year 1986 and $124,400,000 for fiscal year 1987."

SEC. 1002. INCREASE IN NUMBER OF PEACE CORPS VOLUNTEERS.

(a) STATEMENT OF POLICY.—Section 2 of the Peace Corps Act (22 U.S.C. 2501) is amended—

(1) by inserting "(a)" immediately after "SEC. 2."; and

(2) by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(b) The Congress declares that it is the policy of the United States and a purpose of the Peace Corps to provide, to the maximum extent possible, opportunities for service in the Peace Corps to at least 10,000 individuals by the end of the fiscal year 1989 and thereafter.".

(b) ANNUAL REPORT.—Section 11 of the Peace Corps Act (22 U.S.C. 2510) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "The President shall also include in the report a description of the plans developed and implemented to carry out the policy set forth in section 2(b) of this Act.".

SEC. 1003. LIMITATION ON SERVICE.

Section 7(a)(2) of the Peace Corps Act (22 U.S.C. 2506(a)(2)) is amended—

(1) in subparagraph (A) by striking out "five" and inserting in lieu thereof "seven and a half"; and

(2) in the third sentence by inserting "(other than the provisions of section 309)" after "1980".

SEC. 1004. PEACE CORPS PUBLICATIONS.

Section 15 of the Peace Corps Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(e) Technical publications produced by the Peace Corps may be sold at cost in furtherance of the purposes of this Act. Up to $200,000 of the proceeds of such sales in each fiscal year may, to such extent as may be provided in advance in appropriation Acts, be credited to the currently applicable appropriation of the Peace Corps, notwithstanding section 3302(b) of title 31, United States Code.".

TITLE XI—OTHER POLICY PROVISIONS RELATING TO UNITED STATES ASSISTANCE

SEC. 1101. NOTICE TO CONGRESS OF USE OF CERTAIN AUTHORITIES RELATING TO HUMAN RIGHTS CONDITIONS.

Section 502B of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(g) Whenever the provisions of subsection (e) or (f) of this section are applied, the President shall report to the Congress before making any funds available pursuant to those subsections. The report shall specify the country involved, the amount and kinds of assistance to be provided, and the justification for providing the assistance, including a description of the significant improvements which have occurred in the country's human rights record.".

SEC. 1102. PROHIBITIONS AGAINST ASSISTANCE.

Section 620(f) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 is amended—

(1) by inserting "(1)" immediately after "(f)";

(2) by redesignating clauses (1), (2), and (3) as clauses (A), (B), and (C), respectively; and

(3) by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(2) Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph (1) of this subsection, the President may remove a country, for such period as the President determines, from the application of this subsection, and other provisions which reference this subsection, if the President determines and reports to the Congress that such action is important to the national interest of the United States. It is the sense of the Congress that when consideration is given to authorizing assistance to a country removed from the application of this subsection, one of the factors to be weighed, among others, is whether the country in question is giving evidence of fostering the establishment of a genuinely democratic system, with respect for internationally recognized human rights.".

SEC. 1103. LAND REFORM PROGRAMS.

Section 620(g) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following sentence: "This prohibition shall not apply to monetary assistance made available for use by a government (or a political subdivision or agency of a government) to compensate nationals of that country in accordance with a land reform program, if the President determines that monetary assistance for such land reform program will further the national interests of the United States.".

SEC. 1104. NUCLEAR NON-PROLIFERATION CONDITIONS ON ASSISTANCE FOR PAKISTAN.

Section 620E of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(e) No assistance shall be furnished to Pakistan and no military equipment or technology shall be sold or transferred to Pakistan, pursuant to the authorities contained in this Act or any other Act, unless the President certifies in writing to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate, during the fiscal year in which assistance is to be furnished or military equipment or technology is to be sold or transferred, that Pakistan does not possess a nuclear explosive device and that the proposed United States assistance program will reduce significantly the risk that Pakistan will possess a nuclear explosive device.".

SEC. 1105. SUSPENSION OF ASSISTANCE TO COUNTRIES VIOLATING U.S. EXPORT LAWS IN ORDER TO MANUFACTURE A NUCLEAR EXPLOSIVE DEVICE.

(a) SUSPENSION OF ASSISTANCE BECAUSE OF ILLEGAL EXPORTS.—Subsection (a)(1) of section 670 of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 is amended—

(1) by inserting "(A)" after "country which";

(2) by inserting immediately before the period at the end thereof ", or (B) is a non-nuclear-weapon state which, on or after the date of enactment of the International Security and Development Cooperation Act of 1985, exports illegally (or attempts to export illegally) from the United States any material, equipment, or technology which would contribute significantly to the ability of such country to manufacture a nuclear explosive device, if the President determines that the material, equipment, or technology was to be used by such country in the manufacture of a nuclear explosive device"; and

(3) by adding at the end thereof the following: "For purposes of clause (B), an export (or attempted export) by a person who is an agent of, or is otherwise acting on behalf of or in the interests of, a country shall be considered to be an export (or attempted export) by that country.".

(b) CONFORMING AMENDMENTS.—Such section 670 is amended—

(1) in the section caption by inserting "ILLEGAL EXPORTS FOR NUCLEAR EXPLOSIVE DEVICES," after "TRANSFERS,"; and

(2) by striking out "(5) As used in this subsection" and inserting in lieu thereof "(c) As used in this section".

(c) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by this section shall take effect on the date of enactment of this Act.

SEC. 1106. REPORTS ON ECONOMIC CONDITIONS IN CERTAIN COUNTRIES.

(a) EXTERNAL DEBT BURDEN OF CERTAIN COUNTRIES RECEIVING U.S. ASSISTANCE.—The Congress finds that the Governments of Egypt, Israel, Turkey, and Portugal each have an enormous external debt burden which may be made more difficult by virtue of financing provided for those governments under various United States assistance programs.

(b) ANNUAL REPORTS ON ECONOMIC CONDITIONS.—

(1) REQUIREMENT FOR REPORTS.—In order to assist the Congress in examining United States assistance for these countries, the President shall report to the Congress annually regarding economic conditions prevailing in Egypt, Israel, Turkey, and Portugal which may affect their respective ability to meet their international debt obligations and to stabilize their economies.

SEC. 1107. EGYPTIAN-ISRAELI RELATIONS.

The Congress notes the recent effort of Egypt to move the peace process forward. However, the Congress continues to be concerned about the less than normal relations between Egypt and Israel. It is the sense of the Congress that all United States foreign assistance to Egypt is provided in the expectation that the Egyptian Government will continue in its efforts to bring peace to the region and that it will continue to support and fulfill the provisions of the Camp David Accords and the Egyptian-Israeli Peace Treaty, including the return of the Egyptian ambassador to Israel.

SEC. 1108. UNITED STATES POLICY TOWARD THE REPUBLIC OF KOREA.

(a) FINDINGS.—The Congress finds that—

(1) the Government of the Republic of Korea has taken several significant and encouraging steps in liberalizing the political system in that country;

(2) among the steps which have facilitated a more democratic environment are the release of hundreds of student demonstrators, the lifting of a political ban on more than 300 opposition leaders, and the holding of a vigorously contested election for the National Assembly in which the opposition made substantial gains;

(3) despite these steps, the people of the Republic of Korea, who have become increasingly better educated and prosperous as a result of Korea's extraordinarily rapid economic development, have the desire and the capability to participate more fully and effectively in the government of their own country; and

(4) while internationally recognized human rights are clearly respected much more in the Republic of Korea than in the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, continued progress toward democratization in the south is in the interests of both the Republic of Korea and the United States, inasmuch as long-term political stability cannot be assured in the absence of further progress towards democratic government.

(b) UNITED STATES POLICY.—It is the policy of the United States to provide assistance to the Republic of Korea in order to help that country defend itself against external aggression. It is the hope of the United States that the continuing close relations between our two countries, including such assistance, will encourage the establishment of a genuinely democratic system in the Republic of Korea, in which internationally recognized human rights, including freedom of the press, freedom of association, and freedom of assembly are observed.

SEC. 1109. ASSISTANCE FOR THE PHILIPPINES.

(a) UNITED STATES POLICY.—It is the sense of the Congress that the United States should use all appropriate means to ensure that the people of the Philippines and the entire East Asia region understand that United States assistance to the Philippines—

(1) is provided to support democracy, to encourage an effective effort against the communist insurgency, and to maintain and foster friendly relations between the people of the United States and the people of the Philippines; and

(2) is not intended to imply support for any particular Philippine regime.

(b) OBJECTIVES.—To that end, United States foreign assistance furnished to the Philippines each fiscal year should be used to encourage and promote objectives such as—

(1) full observance of internationally recognized human rights in accordance with sections 116 and 502B of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, including an end to "salvagings" and torture, as well as full respect for other fundamental human rights, including freedom of speech, freedom of the press, and freedom of assembly;

(2) the revitalization of democratic institutions in the Philippines, including—

(A) the process of free, fair, and open elections, one element of such process being the existence of a genuinely independent and respected electoral commission, and

(B) limiting the use of the President's emergency decree-making power to genuine emergencies;

(3) maintenance of an independent judiciary and legal due process;

(4) accountability and a fair judicial process in the Aquino assassination trial;

(5) progress toward implementation of structural economic reforms and a strengthening of the private sector, including the elimination of corruption and monopolies and an improvement in the social conditions of the poorest Filipinos and in the distribution of income and wealth;

(6) the increased professional capability of the Philippine armed forces in order to instill a greater respect for human rights on their part, to enhance the military effectiveness of these forces in dealing with the growing communist insurgency, and to facilitate a process of peaceful national reconciliation;

(7) efforts of Filipinos to deal with the political, economic, and social root causes of the growing communist movement and insurgency, as well as the appropriate military measures to stem the insurgency; and

(8) the maintenance of the common security objectives of the United States and the Philippines, including United States access to the facilities at Clark Field and Subic Bay.

(c) REPORTS TO THE CONGRESS.—

(1) PROGRESS TOWARDS OBJECTIVES.—The President shall report to the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate on the extent to which the Government of the Philippines has made progress in the objectives identified in subsection (b), including the extent to which those objectives have been agreed to by the Government of the Philippines and concrete steps taken to achieve those objectives.

(2) ASSISTANCE TRANSFERRED.—Each report pursuant to this subsection shall also describe the amount of assistance actually transferred by the United States to the Philippines during the preceding 6 months, the purposes for which it is to be used, the beneficiaries of the assistance, and the specific steps the United States has taken to publicize the various programs and projects for which our assistance has been utilized. Such reports shall also include the text of any memorandum or agreement between the United States Government and the Government of the Philippines regarding the use of local currencies generated from assistance furnished to carry out chapter 4 of part II of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 (relating to the economic support fund) or generated from the sale of agricutural commodities under the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954.

(3) DISTRIBUTION OF ASSISTANCE THROUGH THE CATHOLIC CHURCH, PVOS, AND COOPERATIVES.—The first report pursuant to this subsection shall include an analysis of the feasibility of distributing as much United States economic assistance to the Philippines as possible through the Catholic Church, private and voluntary organizations, and cooperatives, rather than through government agencies.

(4) TIME FOR SUBMISSION OF REPORTS.—Reports pursuant to this subsection shall be submitted semi-annually, beginning on October 1, 1985, and every six months thereafter until October 1, 1987.

SEC. 1110. POLITICAL SETTLEMENT IN SRI LANKA.

(a) FINDINGS.—The Congress finds that—

(1) the Government and people of Sri Lanka and the Government and people of the United States share a common devotion to independence, democracy, and human rights;

(2) the United States is concerned over the armed clashes between the security forces of the Government of Sri Lanka and some Sri Lankans who seek through violent means, including terrorist attacks, to divide that nation;

(3) there have been acts of terrorism committed against members of the Sri Lankan security forces, as well as against civilians, and there have been human rights abuses by members of the security forces against civilians, particularly Tamils, despite the efforts of the Government to put an end to those abuses;

(4) the differences and grievances in Sri Lanka cannot be resolved through the use of force; and

(5) the United States is a proud participant through its economic assistance programs in Sri Lanka's highly regarded development efforts and looks forward to enhanced cooperation and assistance in the context of a political settlement in Sri Lanka leading to the kind of peaceful climate in which additional aid could be effectively utilized.

(b) POLITICAL SETTLEMENT.—It is, therefore, the sense of the Congress that—

(1) all parties in Sri Lanka, from all communities in and out of government, should renew their efforts to achieve a joint political settlement which meets the legitimate concerns of all the people of Sri Lanka, while preserving the territorial integrity of Sri Lanka; and

(2) all parties outside Sri Lanka should do nothing which would impede progress toward such a settlement.

SEC. 1111. ASSISTANCE FOR AFGHANISTAN.

(a) AUTHORIZATION.—The President may make available funds authorized to be appropriated to carry out the provisions of chapter 1 of part I (relating to development assistance) and chapter 4 of part II (relating to the economic support fund) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 for the provision of food, medicine, or other humanitarian assistance to the Afghan people, notwithstanding any other provision of law.

(b) FUNDING TARGET.—It is the sense of the Congress that the President is strongly urged to use not less than $15,000,000 in fiscal years 1985 and 1986 for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this section.

(c) EFFECTIVE DATE.—This section shall take effect on the date of enactment of this Act.

SEC. 1112. ASSISTANCE FOR THE CAMBODIAN PEOPLE.

The President may make available to the noncommunist resistance forces in Cambodia up to $5,000,000 for fiscal year 1986 and up to $5,000,000 for fiscal year 1987 of the funds authorized to be appropriated to carry out chapter 2 or chapter 4 of part II of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, notwithstanding any other provision of law.

TITLE XII—MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

SEC. 1201. EFFECTIVE DATE.

Except as otherwise provided in this Act, this Act shall take effect on October 1, 1985.

SEC. 1202. PROCUREMENT OF CONSTRUCTION AND ENGINEERING SERVICES.

Section 604(g) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 is amended—

(1) by inserting "(1)" after "(g)"; and

(2) by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(2) Paragraph (1) does not apply with respect to an advanced developing country which—

"(A) is receiving direct economic assistance under chapter 1 of part I or chapter 4 of part II of this Act, and

"(B) if the country has its own foreign assistance programs which finance the procurement of construction or engineering services, permits United States firms to compete for those services.".

SEC. 1203. COMPLETION OF PLANS AND COST ESTIMATES.

(1) in subsection (a) by striking out "$100,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$500,000"; and

(2) in subsection (b) by striking out "the procedures set forth in the Principles and Standards for Planning Water and Related Land Resources, dated October 25, 1973, with respect to such computations" and inserting in lieu thereof "the principles, standards, and procedures established pursuant to the Water Resources Planning Act (42 U.S.C. 1962, et seq.) or acts amendatory or supplementary thereto".

SEC. 1204. REPROGRAMING NOTIFICATIONS TO CONGRESS.

Section 634A of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, as amended by title I of this Act, is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(c) The President shall notify the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate and the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives concerning any reprograming of funds in the International Affairs Budget Function, the authorizations of appropriations for which are in their respective jurisdictions, to the same degree and with the same conditions as the President notifies the Committees on Appropriations. The requirements of this subsection are in addition to, and not in lieu of, other notification requirements.".

SEC. 1205. REPEAL OF OBSOLETE PROVISIONS AND CORRECTION OF TECHNICAL REFERENCES.

(a) REPEALS.—The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 is amended as follows:

(1) The third sentence of section 105(a) is repealed.

(2) Section 106(b)(1) is amended by striking out "(A)" and by striking out subparagraph (B).

(3) Section 110 is amended by striking out "(a)" and by striking out subsection (b).

(4) Chapter 10 of part I is repealed.

(b) CORRECTION OF CROSS-REFERENCES.—

(2) TITLE 31 OF THE U.S. CODE.—Section 611(a) of such Act is amended by striking out "section 1311 of the Supplemental Appropriation Act, 1955 as amended (31 U.S.C. 200)" and inserting in lieu thereof "section 1501 of title 31, United States Code".

(3) ITAR REGULATIONS.—Section 47(6) of the Arms Export Control Act is amended by striking out "combat" and inserting in lieu thereof "military".

SEC. 1206. CODIFICATION OF POLICY PROHIBITING NEGOTIATIONS WITH THE PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION.

(a) UNITED STATES POLICY.—The United States in 1975 declared in a memorandum of agreement with Israel, and has reaffirmed since, that "The United States will continue to adhere to its present policy with respect to the Palestine Liberation Organization, whereby it will not recognize or negotiate with the Palestine Liberation Organization so long as the Palestine Liberation Organization does not recognize Israel's right to exist and does not accept Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338.".

(b) REAFFIRMATION AND CODIFICATION OF POLICY.—The United States hereby reaffirms that policy. In accordance with that policy—

(1) no officer or employee of the United States Government, and no agent or other individual acting on behalf of the United States Government, shall negotiate with the Palestine Liberation Organization or any representatives thereof, and unless and until the Palestine Liberation Organization recognizes Israel's right to exist, accepts United Nations Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338, and renounces the use of terrorism.

(2) the United States shall not recognize the Palestine Liberation Organization,

SEC. 1207. COMMISSION FOR THE PRESERVATION OF AMERICA'S HERITAGE ABROAD.

(a) PURPOSE.—Because the fabric of a society is strengthened by visible reminders of the historical roots of the society, it is in the national interest of the United States to encourage the preservation and protection of the cemeteries, monuments, and historic buildings associated with the foreign heritage of United States citizens.

(b) ESTABLISHMENT.—There is established a commission to be known as the Commission for the Preservation of America's Heritage Abroad (hereafter in this section referred to as the "Commission").

(c) DUTIES.—The Commission shall—

(1) identify and publish a list of those cemeteries, monuments, and historic buildings located abroad which are associated with the foreign heritage of United States citizens from eastern and central Europe, particularly those cemeteries, monuments, and buildings which are in danger of deterioration or destruction;

(2) encourage the preservation and protection of such cemeteries, monuments, and historic buildings by obtaining, in cooperation with the Department of State, assurances from foreign governments that the cemeteries, monuments, and buildings will be preserved and protected; and

(3) prepare and disseminate reports on the condition of and the progress toward preserving and protecting such cemeteries, monuments, and historic buildings.

(d) MEMBERSHIP.—

(1) The Commission shall consist of 21 members, of whom 7 shall be appointed by the President, 7 shall be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and 7 shall be appointed by the President pro tempore of the Senate.

(2)(A) Except as provided in subparagraphs (B), (C), and (D), members shall be appointed for terms of 3 years.

(B) Of the members first appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, 5 shall be appointed for a term of 2 years. Of the members first appointed by the President pro tempore of the Senate, 5 shall be appointed for 2 years.

(C) A member appointed to fill a vacancy on the Commission shall serve for the remainder of the term for which the member's predecessor was appointed.

(D) A member may retain membership on the Commission until the member's successor has been appointed.

(3) The President shall designate the Chairman of the Commission from among its members.

(e) MEETINGS.—The Commission shall meet at least once every three months.

(f) COMPENSATION AND PER DIEM.—

(1) Members of the Commission shall receive no pay on account of their service on the Commission.

(2) While away from their homes or regular places of business in the performance of services for the Commission, members of the Commission shall be allowed travel expenses, including per diem in lieu of subsistence, in the same manner as persons employed intermittently in the Government service are allowed expenses under section 5703 of title 5 of the United States Code.

(g) AUTHORITIES.—

(1) The Commission or any member it authorizes may, for the purposes of carrying out this section, hold such hearings, sit and act at such times and places, request such attendance, take such testimony, and receive such evidence, as the Commission considers appropriate.

(2) The Commission may appoint such personnel (subject to the provisions of title 5 of the United States Code which govern appointments in the competitive service) and may fix the pay of such personnel (subject to the provisions of chapter 51 and subchapter III of chapter 53 of such title, relating to classification and General Schedule pay rates) as the Commission deems desirable.

(3) The Commission may procure temporary and intermittent services to the same extent as is authorized by section 3109(b) of title 5 of the United States Code, but at rates for individuals not to exceed the daily equivalent of the maximum annual rate of basic pay then in effect for grade GS-18 of the General Schedule (5 U.S.C. 5332(a)).

(4) Upon request of the Commission, the head of any Federal department or agency, including the Secretary of State, may detail, on a reimbursable basis, any of the personnel of such department or agency to the Commission to assist it in carrying out its duties under this section.

(5) The Commission may secure directly from any department or agency of the United States, including the Department of State, any information necessary to enable it to carry out this section. Upon the request of the Chairman of the Commission, the head of such department or agency shall furnish such information to the Commission.

(6) The Commission may accept, use, and dispose of gifts or donations of money or property.

(7) The Commission may use the United States mails in the same manner and upon the same conditions as other departments and agencies of the United States.

(8) The Administrator of General Services shall provide to the Commission on a reimbursable basis such administrative support services as the Commission may request.

(h) REPORTS.—The Commission shall transmit an annual report to the President and to each House of Congress as soon as practicable after the end of each fiscal year. Each report shall include a detailed statement of the activities and accomplishments of the Commission during the preceding fiscal year and any recommendations by the Commission for legislation and administrative actions.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

IN SUPPORT OF ISAAC AND SOPHIE KOGAN

HON. JOHN F. SEIBERLING

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, I rise to call attention to the plight of Soviet Jews.

Jewish emigration has declined dramatically in recent years from 51,000 in 1979 to less than 1,000 in 1984. Despite the change in Soviet leadership and the resumption of arms control negotiations, Soviet mistreatment of Jews and refuseniks continues unabated.

Sadly, we in Congress have little direct leverage with which to persuade the Soviet leadership to abandon its campaign of harassment and intimidation.

We can, however, call international attention to the unjust treatment of these people by bringing to light the cases of individual refuseniks and their families.

One such case is that of Isaac and Sophie Kogan. I was first made aware of the problems facing Isaac Kogan and his family when a constituent of mine contacted me during a recent visit to Washington by members of the Student Coalition for Soviet Jewry.

Kogan, a refusenik from Leningrad, first applied for permission to emigrate from the Soviet Union in 1974. His request was denied for security reasons. Yet 2 years earlier, Kogan had voluntarily resigned his position at an electronics factory, for which he was trained, to work as a manual laborer on the Leningrad railroad in order to avoid any connection with security work. In August 1976, Kogan was again denied a visa, this time with a warning: "You will crumble before you get out." Ten years later, Isaac Kogan is working as a delivery man and still trying to get out of the Soviet Union. Even though he has not been in a profession which would make him privy to anything dealing with government security, the authorities still refuse to allow him and his family to leave because of security reasons.

Mr. Speaker, we must continue to communicate and publicize our dissatisfaction to the Soviet leadership in hopes that public pressure will persuade Soviet authorities to end their oppressive treatment of Soviet Jewry.●

THE SPACE INVESTMENT TAX EQUITY ACT

HON. THOMAS J. DOWNEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. DOWNEY of New York. Mr. Speaker, today I, and the distinguished chairman of the Space Science Subcommittee, Mr. NELSON, are introducing "the Space Investment Tax Equity Act of 1985," which adjusts current tax law provisions placing huge but unintentional roadblocks in the way of space commercialization.

Our bill is simple; it merely assures the same tax treatment for space manufacturing ventures already allowed those activities on land.

Current law was enacted long before space manufacturing became reality and therefore, rules specifying that equipment must be used within the U.S. borders denies them the investment tax credit and accelerated cost recovery. If we do not enact our legislation soon it is likely that many worthwhile projects will not be cost-competitive and therefore canceled while our worldwide competitors bound ahead.

Several major aerospace companies plan exciting projects including the manufacture of drugs, the growth and manufacture of crystals for advanced computer chips, and the casting of new metals and alloys. One estimate is that by the year 2000, commercial space activities may be worth as much as $200 billion to $300 billion to our national economy and may account for millions of jobs. Last year the Congress took the first step in clearing the way for space commercialization by removing any doubt that products manufactured in space by U.S. companies would not be subject to import duties upon their return to Earth. Now it is time to remove the remaining tax impediments.

In short, doing business today with high interest rates and foreign competition is tough enough. Space ventures inherently involve even more risk, they are longer term before payback of investment, and they are very costly. Yet any investment in space by a U.S. company must still compete with investments on Earth. Our effort is to equalize tax treatment between them so that such decisions are not dominated by the illogical factor of tax consequences.

I ask that the text of our bill be printed below and urge my colleagues to join us as cosponsors.

A BILL To amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to clarify the application of the investment tax credit, the deduction for depreciation, and the income source rules with respect to property used, and services performed, in space

SEC. 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Space Investment Tax Equity Act of 1985."

SEC. 2. INVESTMENT TAX CREDIT ALLOWED FOR CERTAIN PROPERTY USED IN SPACE.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Paragraph (2) of section 48(a) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to property used outside the United States) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subparagraph:

"(C) TREATMENT OF CERTAIN PROPERTY USED IN SPACE.—For purposes of subparagraph (A), in the case of property (or any interest therein) of a United States person, use of such property in space shall not be treated as use outside the United States if—

"(i) such property is a spacecraft which, while in space, is substantially controlled from 1 or more facilities located in the United States, or

"(ii) such property is used on a spacecraft in space while such spacecraft is so controlled."

"(2) QUALIFIED SPACECRAFT.—For purposes of this subsection, the term 'qualified spacecraft' means any craft which, while in space, is substantially controlled from 1 or more facilities located in the United States."

(b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by this section shall apply to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1985.●

HAPPY "25TH" TO GUS MOODY

HON. THOMAS F. HARTNETT

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. HARTNETT. Mr. Speaker, on May 4 of this year, the town of Summerville, located in my district, will celebrate a very auspicious occasion.

On that special day, James A. "Gus" Moody will be recognized for his 25 years of devotion to his duty as director of the Summerville High School Band.

Mr. Speaker, the mention of this band's name anywere in South Carolina evokes respect and envy. These kids are winners and leaders in the very important area of high school music, mainly due to the leadership of Gus Moody over the past 25 years. This year alone he has the responsibility of moulding some 700 youngsters into integral, harmonious parts of a great traditional musical unit.

Thanks to Gus Moody, the excellence of the Summerville High School Band is certain to continue, hopefully for at least another 25 years.●

CAN WE OUTGROW THE DEFICIT?

HON. WILLIS D. GRADISON, JR.

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. GRADISON. Mr. Speaker, for some time I have argued that action on the deficit is of paramount importance. While I believe most of my colleagues—Republicans as well as Democrats—agree with me on this, there are those who cling to the belief that little or no action is required. These super growth optimists have put forth the proposition that the economy can grow its way out of the deficit.

Heretofore, arguments on both sides have been brief and lacked comprehensiveness. This has just changed. The Congressional Research Service has just released a major study entitled, "Can the United States Grow Out of Its Budget Deficit?" (Report No. 85-78 E). This study leaves no stone unturned.

In short, the answer to the question is an unambiguous "No!"; only with the most highly improbable economic assumptions and scenarios can one reasonably hope to grow out of the deficit by 1990.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to read this timely report, especially if they retain any faith in economic miracles. It is possible that the recent GNP figure is an anomoly, but I believe we should take it as a warning; the economy may now be in a slowdown. Do we chance continued inaction on the deficit?

The general policy prescription is not in doubt. A decisive deficit reduction will put downward pressure on real interest rates and thus the dollar, with the result of stimulating capital investment and improving U.S. world competitiveness.

At this time, I wish to insert in the RECORD the principal chapter summaries and overall conclusion of the new CRS study.

SUMMARY FOR CHAPTER TWO

In order to eliminate the deficit in 1990, GNP must grow at a rate of 5.5 percent for the next five years. This rate cannot be achieved merely by means of a rapid business cycle expansion. Even though unemployed resources exist in the economy, insufficient quantities exist to produce the level of income needed to balance the budget without spending or tax changes. A more rapid secular growth rate (i.e., faster growth in potential output) is required to achieve this. This is true even with optimistic estimate of growth in the labor force over the five years. Without a substantial increase in the economy's secular growth rate, such rapid GNP growth cannot be sustained, and would likely generate accelerating inflation. Private sector productivity growth will have to average 4 percent in order for the economy and the budget to follow the high growth scenario without over-stimulating the economy, substantially worsening inflation, and precipitating policy actions that bring about another contraction and a rising deficit.

While selected past experience reveals periods in which productivity has grown at high rates for sustained amounts of time, this appears to have been due to cyclical factors that either are not relevant to the current situation or may not be desirable to replicate because of their side effects. Indeed, the 1960's, rather than being a model to imitate in the 1980's, illustrates the problems with pursuing a high growth path. Rapid GNP and productivity growth were achieved as a consequence of strong demand stimulus. The stimulus reduced unemployment below its financial level and generated increasing inflation. Unless there are economic factors that make the 1980's different from historial experience, it would seem very unlikely that economic growth can be rapid enough to eliminate the deficit without planting the seeds of its later resurgence.

SUMMARY FOR CHAPTER THREE

A number of phenomena could make the future different from the past in that they could make the possibility of rapid growth in the next five years more likely than recent experience suggests. An analysis of these, however, suggests that they do not add much to the probability of rapid growth.

If tax incentives for investment and R and D are to spur productivity enough to yield a balanced budget, capital formation and R and D would have to increase dramatically. Only the most improbably optimistic assumptions about the response of business investment to tax cuts could produce the kinds of increase in the capital-labor ratio and in research and development necessary to yield such results.

Similarly, even a large drop in the natural rate of unemployment would still mean that improbably high rates of productivity would be required to balance the budget in 1990. While larger increases in the labor force—occuring spontaneously or as a result of policy inducement—could help make rapid growth more likely by increasing the secular availability of resources to produce, these increases would simultaneously tend to raise the natural rate of unemployment and make rapid productivity gains less likely, so that the net possible contribution of labor force growth to GNP growth is reduced.

CONCLUSION

With deficits projected to remain approximately 5 percent of GNP for the rest of the decade, concern exists that large tax and spending measures will have to be undertaken to reduce them. It has been argued, however, that these deficits will not be as large as projected—or need not be—because economic growth can substantially reduce or even eliminate them. Indeed, it is argued, attempts to reduce the deficit with tax or spending measures may actually decrease the chances for balancing the budget by dampening economic activity.

Using CBO baseline economic and budget projections as a starting point, this report analyzes the underlying assumptions of this rapid growth proposition. It is found that the economy would have to grow at a 5.5 percent annual rate through 1990 to eliminate the deficit without spending or tax changes. Moreover, it is found that such growth cannot result from cyclical recovery (i.e., employment of unemployed resources) alone. Secular growth assumptions also are crucial to the rapid growth scenario. Productivity growth of about 4 percent for five consecutive years is necessary to eliminate the deficit if accelerating inflation (and the contractionary anti-inflation policies that are likely to follow) is to be avoided. Examination of post-war U.S. economic performance suggests that such a substantial productivity increase is highly improbable if the economy is not to be overstimulated. Earlier U.S. performance and experience abroad offer no more encouragement to this scenario.

Similarly, evidence that policy changes recently adopted or likely to be pursued can stimulate such growth is also weak. Capital formation would have to be dramatically increased in order to produce the productivity gains required of the scenario. The same is true of research and development activity. While both may be boosted by tax policies, the tax incentives are not of the magnitude to suggest such dramatic results.

Improvements in the non-accelerating inflation rate of unemployment do not put much of a dent into the productivity growth requirements of the rapid growth scenario, either. While faster labor force growth than projected is possible (and possible to promote), the demographic characteristics of the additional labor would be such to tend to create partially offsetting increases in frictional unemployment and reductions in potential productivity growth.

These computations are, of course, in terms of growth required to eliminate the deficit. The demands placed on growth in order to merely reduce the deficit substantially would be less. A rapid growth scenario that reduces rather than eliminates the deficit, therefore, would be more likely than the scenario discussed in this paper. However, this report has not discussed the other major impediment to rapid growth: the possibility of a new contraction before the decade is complete. Any rapid growth scenario rests on two assumptions: that economic expansion is long and that it is rapid. Avoidance of a new contraction in the 1980's is possible. However, the more rapid the recovery, the less likely the recovery will be prolonged. The sooner "full" employment is reached the more probable there will be a downturn immediately following. Consequently, any rapid growth scenario is unlikely, even with policy actions designed to promote it. Most of any sustained reduction in the budget deficit, therefore, would likely have to come from spending cuts or tax increases and not economic growth.●

HONORING RETIRING LOS ANGELES COUNTY SHERIFF'S LT. KENNETH SHIRLEY

HON. ESTEBAN EDWARD TORRES

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. TORRES. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to bring to the attention of my colleagues the distinguished career and service of retiring Lt. Kenneth Shirley of the Los Angeles County Sheriff's Department.

On May 3, 1985 Lieutenant Shirley will be honored by his friends and colleagues in the sheriff's department, with a retirement dinner celebrating 31 years of service to law enforcement and the community. I am honored to call attention to Lieutenant Shirley's outstanding career. Ken joined the Los Angeles County Sheriff's Department at the age of 23. Following his academy training he was assigned to patrol, main office or what is known today as transportation bureau.

Eighteen months later, he was assigned to the East Los Angeles Station were he worked for the next 2 years. In January 1957, Ken began a 10 year tour of duty at Temple Station. During his stay there, Ken worked almost every job at the station, including 5 years as coordinator of reserve deputies. He also worked in the Narcotics Bureau at Temple Station for 6 year.

In 1968, Ken transferred to the sheriff's information bureau. Five months later, he was assigned the job as bodyguard and driver to Sheriff Peter J. Pitchess. He kept that position through his promotion to both sergeant and lieutenant, until October 1975, when he was assigned to detective division.

Ken reacquainted himself with the reserve forces bureau in April 1976, when he was assigned there as the operations lieutenant. He stayed there for 3 years, until his assignment to custody division, where he worked at inmate services bureau as the operations lieutenant. In March 1981 he went back to reserve forces bureau, where, along with being operations lieutenant, he was acting captain for 6 months.

On July 1, 1985, Ken went to his last assignment in the department, the hall of justice jail where he has served until the present.

Ken has been married to the former Jackie Jacobson for the past 36 years. They have three children, Wayne, Rusty, and Vicki, who is married to Deputy Larry Cobb of the industry station.

Mr. Speaker, I ask my colleagues to join me in sending our best wishes and commending Kenneth Shirley for his outstanding dedication and service to the people of Los Angeles and the surrounding community.●

BOSTON LATIN SCHOOL: THE BEGINNING OF PUBLIC EDUCATION IN AMERICA

HON. BRIAN J. DONNELLY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Speaker, tomorrow, April 23, marks an important date in the history of our Nation. It is the 350th anniversary of the start of public education in America.

In the spring of 1635, the early settlers of Boston first made provision for educating their next generation, and Boston Latin School was begun.

For three and one-half centuries, Boston Latin School has provided a free, classical education to the children of the city.

Millions of Americans will have an opportunity to see a reproduction of the school's historic edifice on a new postage stamp, commemorating this important anniversary of public education. Most Americans already know of the historic deeds of many of the schools distinguished alumni, among them the revolutionary patriots John Hancock, Benjamin Franklin, and John and Samuel Adams, educator James Bowdoin, philosophers Ralph Waldo Emerson and George Santayana, architect Charles Bulfinch, and conductor and composer Leonard Bernstein.

I am sure many of my colleagues join me in congratulating Boston Latin School on this milestone and on its 350 years as a model of excellence in public education in the United States.

I would like to share excerpts of an article noting this anniversary that appeared today in the Boston Globe.

BOSTON LATIN AT 350 FACES CHALLENGE OF OLD WAYS VERSUS NEW TIMES

In the empty auditorium upstairs, the inscribed names of dead and famous men who once studied at Boston Latin School ring the hall like a crown: Franklin, Emerson, Mather, Bulfinch. Statesman, philosopher, Puritan minister, architect.

In the basement cafeteria, amid the cacophony and crowd of a high school lunch period, a Latin School junior hopes that someday "my name will be up there in the auditorium."

The student is Soraya Butler. A black female, she embodies two of the most profound changes at the nation's oldest public school: the admission of girls in 1972 and court-ordered desegregation in 1974.

Boston Latin School, birthplace of American public education, celebrates its 350th birthday tomorrow. It is older than Harvard. Of the 56 signers of the Declaration of Independence in 1776, five had attended "Latin." This year, 22 seniors have been accepted by Harvard, five by MIT, 20 by Tufts. More than 95 percent of the Class of 1985 will go to college; better than 80 percent likely will receive financial aid.

It is a school dedicated to a classical education and steeped in tradition. Headmaster Michael Contompasis, like five of his predecessors, is a Latin graduate. Some older faculty once taught other, younger colleagues. Upperclassmen still sell 7th graders passes to the nonexistent fourth-floor pool. Admission is selective—and coveted.

WRESTLING WITH ATTRITION

But as it marks its birthday, the school is wrestling with it soul.

"We're trying to maintain academic quality yet make the place more sensitive to individual needs of kids. I think you can do that without lowering standards," says Contompasis. "That's a major change from the old days. You swam or you sank. Or as they used to tell us when I came here, 'Look to your left. Look to your right. Two of you aren't going to make it.'"

But not everyone agrees that standards can be maintained if attrition is substantially reduced. Says one teacher who asked to remain anonymous: "Incidental to maintaining standards there's going to be a high attrition rate. At that kind of school, yes, there will always be significant attrition."

Latin School is the most prestigious of the city's three examination schools and of the entire system. Admission is by entrance exam and grade-point average.

In an office lined with school trophies, Contompasis calls both desegregation and the admission of girls controversial changes whose time had come. In a faculty room, two teachers disagree about whether cafeteria decorum has improved since the admission of girls. In a corridor, Victor Stango, a sophomore from Jamaica Plain who never knew the all-boys' Latin School, says girls make the place "a little more fun."

This is a school where self-motivation is essential and discipline problems, common in other schools, are virtually absent. It is, as almost any student of any race will tell you, a hard school.

In Joseph Desmond's senior Greek class, students gaze intently at the blackboard as the teacher writes, in Greek, the names of Plato, Socrates, and Aristotle and talks softly of Aristotle's belief that man is both body and soul. In Cornellia Kelley-LaCambria's Latin class, 7th graders struggle with case and person so Misi clari poetae librum ad meum amicum translates as "I have sent the book of the famous poet to my friend" instead of "The famous poet sent a book to my friend."

Students see the pressure as either a virtue or a curse.

"It helps you. When you get out of here you'll never be afraid of competition," says Maria Davis of Dorchester, a junior.

"I don't like the competition," says Beth Quelaly, a senior from West Roxbury. "It makes it harder. What I make may be good for me. Other people look down."

Loretta Roach of Dorchester, a parent activist and member of the state Board of Education, found it painful to help her son Rodman through the early grades, when youngsters accustomed to being top students may see their grades tumble. It is then that most attrition occurs.

"When you have a 6-foot kid walking in the door and crying because of what's going down, it's wrenching," says Roach. "It took my husband and I every single day of bolstering this kid. It was a lot of outside support . . . Not support I got at Latin. I say that to other black parents who call me. The demand it makes on parents is extraordinary."

Says Rodman, who is now 17 and a junior: "I didn't believe I'd make it until last year. Now I feel pretty proud."

What some see as a weakness others see as a strength. "It's strengths," says Susan Donlan of West Roxbury, whose son is in 9th grade. "They have to learn to take care of themselves."

Contompasis, who says the school can guarantee equality of opportunity but not equality of results, sees Latin School, now more than ever, as a door opener for bright young Bostonians, many from families of limited means. "How are you going to address the issue of how they get their chance?" he asks.

Meanwhile, Soraya Butler, the black girl from Dorchester who wants to be immortalized on the auditorium walls, says next year she'll help her younger sister adjust to 7th grade at Latin. "Just by coming here you think you have to live up to a lot," she says. "Three hundred and fifty years. That's amazing."●

IN MEMORY OF JOZSEF CARDINAL MINDSZENTY

HON. GERALD B.H. SOLOMON

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Speaker, the Executive Committee of the National Federation of American Hungarians resolved on March 16, 1985, to commemorate the 10th anniversary of the death of Jozsef Cardinal Mindszenty. I would like to enter into the RECORD the text of that commemorative statement, as forwarded to me by executive secretary Sandor Balogh:

JOZSEF CARDINAL MINDSZENTY, MARCH 20, 1892-MAY 6, 1975

For a nation that is over one thousand years old there are many important events to remember. If we were to commemorate every important event in the life of the Hungarian nation, we would have something to commemorate every day of the year. Yet new and important events keep happening as the nation goes on living.

Even during the lifetime of the current generation many events had taken place that deserve to be remembered and commemorated. One such sad event is the passing of Cardinal Mindszenty on May 6, 1975.

The 83 year old Cardinal was a martyr and a symbol of man's resistance to totalitarian tyranny.

He had been first arrested by the Communists during the 1919 Commune and spent more than three months in captivity.

Next he was arrested in 1944 by the Nazis and spent four months under arrest, until the Nazi regime collapsed.

His third arrest came at the hands of the Communists again in 1948. To intimidate the Church of Hungary into submission, following the Soviet methods, at a mock trial he was sentenced to life imprisonment, but the Freedom Fighters rescued him during the glorious days of the 1956 Hungarian Revolution.

The Cardinal was a fearless leader of his nation in her most trying times, and a tireless shepherd of Hungarians throughout the world. After his arrival to the West from his selfimposed exile at the U.S. Embassy in Budapest, he has visited Hungarians on every continent save Asia, encouraging them to "keep the faith and the Hungarian Language".

It is with great sorrow that we remember this towering figure, one of the leading statesmen of the century, a great Hungarian and a great Church leader. But it also fills us with hope that the seed he had planted fell on fertile soil and Saint Stephen's people will keep the faith and the Hungarian language.

May God rest him in his temporary resting place in Mariacell, Austria, until his remains may be returned to a free Hungary as he had always wanted to return to Hungary for his final rest, in the land of his beloved people.

His memory shall live forever.●

NATIONAL DISTINGUISHED SERVICE AWARD TO ALAN GOLDSTEIN

HON. HENRY A. WAXMAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, I am proud to call to the attention of my colleagues in Congress and the American people the numerous achievements of my distinguished constituent and friend, Mr. Alan Goldstein.

On May 5, 1985, Mr. Goldstein will receive the coveted National Distinguished Service Award of the Union of Orthodox Jewish Congregations of America. Mr. Goldstein has been singled out from hundreds of communal leaders across the Nation for this signal honor.

Alan (Avrohom Aaron Leib) Goldstein was born on the eve of World War II to a pious Jewish family in the small village of Erzvelig, Lithuania. During the the years of the Holocaust, the Goldstein family fled from the Nazi occupiers of their native town. Alan hid with his parents in the forests. He subsequently found refuge with a family of compassionate Christians who shielded him from both the Nazi barbarians and the local Lithuanian Fascists.

The Goldsteins were among the less than two dozen survivors of the town's Jewish population of 1,000. All their family and fellow villagers were taken to a ravine and machinegunned to death.

The deprivations of the war years did not break the spirit of the Goldstein family. Alan's parents, Chaim Ztvi and Menucha, came to America with a determination to preserve the religious values of Eastern European Orthodoxy. They were determined to make good use of the religious freedom and economic opportunity offered by their new homeland.

Over the years Alan Goldstein and his family prosposed materially and devoted their talents and resources to help others.

Alan and his brother, David, attended the United Lubavitcher Yeshivoth as nonpaying scholarship students. They expressed their gratitude by working as prominent supporters of the Chabad-Lubavitcher movement in Los Angeles, New York, and Israel.

Alan Goldstein has shown a special commitment to the Ponovezer Institutions of Israel. These religious schools and communal projects reflect the rebirth of Lithuanian Judaism which the Nazis came so close to obliterating.

In addition to Alan Goldstein's deep involvement in the Jewish community, he has found time to labor on behalf of the general welfare. He served the entire city of Los Angeles during the years he was a commissioner of the Community Redevelopment Agency.

The tradition of kindness, charity, and good works belongs to the entire Goldstein family. Alan graciously recognizes that his accomplishments reflect also the efforts of his parents, his brothers David Goldstein and Rabbi Berel Goldstein and their respective families.

In all of Alan's endeavors, his wife Adell (nee Biam) Goldstein has been a constant source of wisdom and encouragement. Both Alan and Adell are thankful to God that their three children, Mrs. Gitel Rubin, their newly acquired son-in-law David Rubin, daughter Devora, and son Yisroel Yosef (Joey) are following the family pattern of piety and commitment to the larger community.

Over the years Alan has also gained much sound guidance and steadfast moral support from his in-laws, Rabbi and Mrs. Benjamin Baim.

I ask my colleagues in the House of Representatives to join me in congratulating Alan Goldstein on the occasion of his receipt of the Orthodox Union's National Distinguished Service Award. We all are grateful for his works of "loving mercy" which is one of the pillars upon which the very existence of the world depends.●

INTRODUCING AMTRAK BILL

HON. BILL RICHARDSON

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill to freeze Amtrak funding for 2 years with no inflation increase, plus a 1-year study to determine alternative funding for its continued existence—including privatization, public offering, or a private sale.

Mr. Chairman, I welcome the opportunity to say that my support for a viable rail passenger service is unequivocal—I believe such service to be vital to our economy, to our security, to our national health and well-being. While the importance of our rail passenger system is sometimes eclipsed by the orbits of the space shuttle, few would deny the fact that almost 20 million persons used Amtrak rail service in 1984 alone; that Amtrak's long-haul passengers are largely drawn from the elderly and the poor; that in the instance of a national emergency, we will all be grateful our rail passenger service was supported by the American people and the Congress of the United States.

The Reagan administration recently recommended zero funding for rail passenger service in this country. While this President seeks to eliminate a vital service to our citizens, the governments of every other major industrial country in the world affirm their support for rail passenger service through reasonable rail subsidies; they provide us with ample evidence that success results from government cooperation and commitment.

This leads us to the question of what the basic role of the Federal Government should be in providing rail passenger service to this country—I will answer this question by saying the role is real, the role is important and the role is substantial. I do not advocate unlimited and indiscriminate funding of rail passenger service—in fact, I advocate just the opposite—I advocate judicious use of the Federal dollar, evidence of a willingness to save taxpayer's money, the need to cut back, support for alternatives to subsidization. This is why I will introduce a bill today which will do just that—it will freeze Amtrak funding at fiscal year 1985 levels for the next 2 years and will study ways to further reduce Federal subsidies. Nonetheless, I believe rail passenger service to be important to the future of the country and Government support too important to the future of rail passenger service.

Mr. Chairman, I do not deny that I have an interest in preserving the Amtrak system—many New Mexicans are employed by this service, it means $10 million additional to my economically depressed district each year, and Amtrak's trains stop in five towns I have been elected to serve. And while I have a personal interest and commitment to seeing that these benefits continue, I would point out that I am not alone—Amtrak serves over 500 communities nationwide—more than all the major airlines combined; Amtrak serves 161 communities that have no air service; Amtrak serves 52 communities that have no bus service; Amtrak serves 29 communities which have neither air nor bus service; and Amtrak employs 21,000 people across the country.

The administration tells us it is committed to economic growth and commerce—how much commerce will occur in those 29 cities which will have no transportation services whatsoever when Amtrak is gone? How much economic growth will result when 21,000 people lose their jobs?

The administration tells us it is committed to national security—how secure will we be if we eliminate 76,000 rail seats that could be used by military personnel in the event of a national emergency?

The administration tells us it is committed to private enterprise and competition—well, we all are, but have there been any takers for rail passenger service?

This administration professes support for a strong, diversified economy—how strong, how diversified will we be with no rail system, no mass transit systems, no airline subsidies, no bus transportation, no Government commitment to national transportation needs?

Mr. Chairmen, the gauntlet has been thrown to the 99th Congress—we can take this opportunity to express our commitment to a strong, lean, efficient rail passenger service or we can have none at all. The choices are very clear and I urge everyone here today to make that choice which is best for this country—a rejection of the administration's misguided notion that we can do without rail passenger service and an affirmation of our support for the Amtrak system.

H.R. —

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.

Section 601(b)(2) of the Rail Passenger Service Act (45 U.S.C. 601(b)(2)) is amended—

(1) in subparagraph (A) by striking out "and" after "403(b) of this Act;";

(2) in subparagraph (B) by striking out the period and inserting in lieu thereof a semicolon; and

(3) by adding at the end the following new subparagraphs:

"(C) not to exceed $684,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1986; and

"(D) not to exceed $684,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1987.".

SEC. 2. STUDY COMMISSION.

(a) ESTABLISHMENT.—There is established a commission to be known as the National Railroad Passenger Corporation Financial Status Commission (hereafter in this Act referred to as the "Commission").

(b) PURPOSE OF COMMISSION.—The purpose of the Commission is to study—

(1) the ability of the National Railroad Passenger Corporation (hereinafter in this Act referred to as "Amtrak") to continue to improve, or to accelerate the improvement of, its financial performance;

(2) the short-term and long-term capital needs of Amtrak; and

(3) alternative funding mechanisms for Amtrak.

(c) MEMBERSHIP.—

(1) NUMBER AND APPOINTMENT.—The Commission shall be composed of 15 members as follows:

(A) The President of Amtrak or his authorized representative.

(B) The President of the National Association of Railroad Passengers or his authorized representative.

(C) Two members of the National Association of Railroad Passengers appointed by the President of such Association; one who lives east of the Mississippi River and one who lives west of the Mississippi River.

(D) A member of the United States Senate appointed by the President pro tempore of the Senate.

(E) A member of the United States House of Representatives appointed by the Speaker of the House.

(F) A representative of the intercity Rail Passenger Committee of the Transportation Research Board appointed by the Executive Committee of the Transportation Research Board.

(G) A representative of the Railway Progress Institute appointed by the President of the Railway Progress Institute.

(H) A State transportation official from a State financially participating in the program established under section 403(b) of the Rail Passenger Service Act, appointed by the Executive Director of the National Conference of State Railway Officials (NCSRO).

(I) A State transportation official from a State not participating in the program established under section 403(b) of the Rail Passenger Service Act, appointed by the Executive Director of the National Conference of State Railway Officials (NCSRO).

(J) A Governor or his authorized representative designated by the National Governors' Association.

(K) A person appointed by the Railway Labor Executives' Association.

(L) A representative of freight railroads appointed by the Association of American Railroads or its successor.

(M) Two commuter authorities, as such term is defined for purposes of the Rail Passenger Service Act, appointed by the American Public Transit Association; one that operates exclusively within the area comprised of Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, and the District of Columbia and one that operates exclusively outside such area.

(2) SELECTION.—The members of the Commission shall be selected in accordance with paragraph (1) within 60 days after the date of enactment of this Act.

(3) BASIC PAY.—

(A) Members of the Commission shall each be paid at a rate equal to the daily equivalent of the annual rate of basic pay payable for level V of the Executive Schedule under subchapter II of chapter 53 of title 5, United States Code, for each day (including travel time) during which they are engaged in the actual performance of duties vested in the Commission.

(B) Members of the Commission who are full-time officers or employees of the United States and Members of Congress shall receive no additional pay by reason of their service on the Commission.

(4) QUORUM.—Eight members of the Commission shall constitute a quorum, but a lesser number may hold hearings.

(5) CHAIRMAN.—The Chairman of the Commission shall be elected by the members of the Commission from among such members.

(6) ORGANIZATIONAL MEETING.—The members of the Commission shall hold their first meeting for the purpose of organizing the Commission and electing a Chairman under paragraph (4) within 90 days after the date of enactment of this Act.

(7) All meetings of the Commission shall be open to the public.

(d) STAFF OF COMMISSION.—

(1) STAFF.—Subject to such rules as may be prescribed by the Commission, the Chairman may appoint such personnel as the Chairman considers appropriate.

(2) APPLICABILITY OF CERTAIN CIVIL SERVICE LAWS.—The staff of the Commission shall be appointed subject to the provisions of title 5, United States Code, governing appointments in the competitive service, and shall be paid in accordance with the provisions of chapter 51 and subchapter III of chapter 53 of such title relating to classification and General Schedule pay rates.

(3) EXPERTS AND CONSULTANTS.—Subject to such rules as may be prescribed by the Commission, the Chairman may procure temporary and intermittent services under section 3109(b) of title 5, United States Code.

(e) POWERS OF COMMISSION.—

(1) HEARINGS AND SESSIONS.—The Commission, or, if so authorized by the Commission, any 3 members of the Commission, may, for the purpose of carrying out this Act, hold such hearings, sit and act at such times and places, take such testimony, and receive such evidence, as the Commission considers appropriate. The Commission may administer oaths or affirmation to witnesses appearing before it.

(2) OBTAINING OFFICIAL DATA.—The Commission may secure directly from any department or agency of the United States information necessary to enable it to carry out this act. Upon request of the Chairman of the Commission, the head of such department or agency shall furnish such information to the Commission.

(3) MAILS.—The Commission may use the United States mails in the same manner and under the conditions as other departments and agencies of the United States.

(4) ADMINISTRATIVE SUPPORT SERVICES.—The Administrator of General Services shall provide to the Commission on a reimbursable basis such administrative support services as the Commission may request.

(f) REPORT.—The Commission shall transmit to the Congress a report not later than January 15, 1987. The report shall contain a detailed statement of the findings and conclusions of the Commissions, together with its recommendations for such legislation as it considers appropriate.

(g) AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.—There is authorized to be appropriated for the purpose of carrying out this section $2,500,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1986, to remain available until expended.●

NATIONAL BOWHUNTER'S WEEK

HON. THOMAS N. KINDNESS

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. KINDNESS. Mr. Speaker, I would welcome the support of my colleagues for legislation I am introducing today which designates the week of July 8 through July 14, 1985, as "National Bowhunter's Week."

Bowhunting was important to native Americans in obtaining food and providing protection long before Europeans arrived on the shores of this great land. We are proud to have headquartered in the Eighth Congressional District of Ohio the International Bowhunting Organization, which has worked ardently to promote and preserve bowhunting as a sport. Likewise, we are proud to have the 1984 Olympic gold medalist in archery, Darrell O. Pace, hail from our area.

The sport of bowhunting is growing throughout the Nation, and in recognition of its contribution to the livelihood of our earliest Americans and its increasing popularity, I urge my colleagues to cosponsor the resolution.●

U.S. SHOULD NOT GIVE MILITARY SUPPORT TO THE NICARAGUAN CONTRA REBELS

HON. HOWARD L. BERMAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. BERMAN. Mr. Speaker, this administration has long been dogged by reports of outrageous waste in the Defense Department and the incredible prices they pay for tools and spare parts. So it is with some relief that we find President Reagan has identified a serious threat to the national security that he believes can be eliminated at a cost of only $14 million.

Some relief. Mr. Reagan's proposal for providing $14 million in military aid to the Contra rebels raises two questions. First, is the Government of Nicaragua a true threat to our national security? Second, can the United States afford the damage done to our influence in the entire region by providing aid to Nicaragua's opponents?

Nicaragua can barely export cotton. It is absurd to think that they can export revolution to the rest of Central America.

The administration's own intelligence reports conclude that military activity by the Nicaraguan Government is "primarily defense-oriented."

Even President Reagan's Undersecretary of Defense, Fred C. Ikle, scoffs at the idea of an armed invasion of another Central American country by Nicaragua. "Both the equipment and their strategic objective at this time is to destroy the armed opposition—the Contras. They want to get control of their own country," Ikle told the Los Angeles Times. "What they have now and even what they may have a year hence is not an invasion force to attack El Salvador and Guatemala. That's nonsense."

The administration's charge that the Nicaraguan Government is a major supplier of arms and ammunition to El Salvadoran rebels is equally unproven.

Nicaragua is supplying small quantities of arms and medical supplies to the rebels in El Salvador. But if major shipments are being regularly made by air from Nicaragua to El Salvador, why have U.S. forces in the region failed in 2 years to intercept a light plane delivering arms to El Salvador or discovered a light plane parked on the ground at one of those alleged isolated airstrips in El Salvador?

Nor is there strong evidence of regular supplies being made by sea. The administration alleges that the tiny port village of Potosi is a major transshipment point. But a 10-month period of intensive radar surveillance conducted by the United States failed to detect a systematic supply of arms to El Salvador from Potosi.

For 4 years now, the administration has been trying to prove that Nicaragua is exporting arms and revolution throughout the region. Now is the time to put up or shut up. If there is solid evidence to back up this justification for U.S. military involvement in the overthrow of the Nicaraguan Government, now is the time to present that evidence. In the absence of evidence, there is no justification for President Reagan's request to send $14 million in military aid to the armed opponents of the Nicaraguan Government.

That raises a second question. Can the United States afford to provide military support to armed rebel groups in Nicaragua? I believe we cannot.

The Nicaraguan Contras are doomed to failure. They are too closely tied to the despised and discredited Somoza regime that the ruling Sandinistas overthrew in 1979. the majority of the Contra military leaders are former members of Somoza's hated national guard.

American influence throughout Latin America was damaged by our establishment by force of the Somoza family in power in Nicaragua and our establishment of the brutal national guard. Fifty years of American support for the Somoza family and its corrupt rule contributed to the region's mistrust and even hatred for the United States.

Military aid to the Somocistas and their hopeless efforts to retake control of that country will only serve to diminish American influence throughout Latin America.

We cannot afford to let that happen. We are not naive about the intentions of the Soviet Union and its client-state, Cuba. They would like to see more Soviet clients established in the Western Hemisphere. Threats by the United States and efforts to support a military invasion of the country by the Contras will only serve to push Nicaragua solidly into the Soviet camp. In fact, such actions will lead to fear and mistrust of the United States by other nations in this hemisphere—and strengthen the Soviet's hand in the region.

That would be the ultimate tragedy. We should not become involved militarily in the absence of a threat to our national security. There is no justification on national security grounds for this involvement. We should not join forces with a group that has no chance to succeed. The Contras are fatally tainted by their association with the Somoza regime. In the course of such an unjustifiable and hopeless involvement, we will only diminish our ability to influence the course of events throughout Latin America at a time when the Soviet Union and Cuba are trying to expand their influence.

For these reasons, I urge strong rejection of this misguided proposal.●

A MINIMUM TAX: THE WEALTHIEST SHOULD PAY TAXES, TOO

HON. GEORGE MILLER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, last week, tens of millions of Americans filed their income tax returns. They paid hundreds of billions of dollars in taxes to the Federal Government in order to provide for the basic services and functions of this Government.

Almost no one likes to pay taxes. But most of us recognize that taxes are our common responsibility. They are the cost of living in this society.

What bothers many Americans about paying their taxes is that others do not pay their fair share. And that means that those of us who do pay are really subsidizing those who are able to find enough loopholes, deductions and writeoffs in the tax code to pass all or most of their tax burden off to someone else.

Tax avoidance is particularly disturbing when it involves corporations who make their profits from the tax money paid by millions of taxpayers in this country. In fact, the 10 largest military contractors receive two-thirds of their sales from the Government—and that means their companies are two-thirds financed by the taxpayers of the United States.

Some of these are the very same companies implicated in massive overcharges for military parts and supplies. These are the companies which bill taxpayers for the costs of boarding pets and corporate gifts, among other dubious "official" expenses.

General Electric and General Dynamics, two of our largest military contractors, paid no taxes last year. In fact, General Dynamics, which made $684 million in pretax profits last year, has paid no taxes since 1972. General Electric earned profits of $6.5 billion between 1981 and 1983, and yet paid no taxes whatever.

As a matter of fact, General Electric, General Dynamics, and a third large military contractor—Boeing—not only paid nothing in taxes, but received $621 million in tax refunds between 1981 and 1983.

Overall, 65 profitable corporations, with combined profits of nearly $50 billion did not pay 1 cent in corporate income tax between 1981 and 1983. Following is a list of those companies and their profits.

Source: Citizens For Tax Justice, "Corporate Income Taxes in the Reagan Years" (Washington, DC: October 1984).

I also note with interest, for example, the tax record of W.R. Grace & Co., whose chairman was so critical of waste and abuse in the tax and spending policies of the Federal Government. It turns out that the same Grace that lectures us all on the obligations of good citizenship made $684 million in profits in the last 3 years, but didn't pay any taxes at all. In fact, Grace received a refund from U.S. taxpayers for $12.5 million.

Some of the wealthiest individuals in our country similarly are able to utilize the tax code in order to avoid paying any personal taxes, and this is just as unacceptable. Earning a lot of money, or hiring a good accountant or attorney, ought not free anyone from paying their share of the costs of living in this country.

How did this abomination come to pass? Look no further than the President's 1981 tax bill. Since that law was enacted, the amount corporations pay in taxes has dropped to the lowest level in history. In 1960, the corporate share of taxes was 20.9 percent; last year, it had dropped to just 8 percent.

But over that same time, the amount paid by middle-income taxpayers has remained 50 percent.

The minimum tax plan does not call for "soaking the rich." It just says that everyone—the middle income wage earner and the wealthy executive—ought to live by the same rules.

We would impose a 25-percent minimum tax on corporations and individuals whose adjusted gross income is more than $100,000 a year. This proposal would affect only those in this very exclusive, very high income group, the very wealthiest nine-tenths of 1 percent of taxpayers.

Lower and middle income taxpayer would pay nothing additionally in taxes. In fact, I would like to see the proceeds from the minimum tax used to reduce lower and middle income tax rates by $15 to $20 billion.

Tax reform is urgently needed, widely supported, and long overdue. I have long supported, and I continue to support, the wide-ranging modernization of our income tax laws in order both to simplify the tax code, and to eliminate those features which allow many of the wealthiest individuals and corporations to escape paying their fair share of taxes.

The minimum tax is not a substitute for comprehensive tax reform. There is no reason it could not be incorporated into a reform plan. But thorough reform could take a great deal of time, and it is unfair to wait even one more tax year before we begin to demand that those who have prospered and profited most join the rest of in paying their fair share of taxes.●

CONGRESS FAILING IN DUTIES?

HON. BILL NICHOLS

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, the following is a statement from my constituent, Lt. Col. Norwood B. Killough (retired) which he has asked me to share with my colleagues here in the House:

I, Norwood B. Killough, a retired Lt. Col. U.S.A.F., living at Rt. 5, Box 256B, Talladega, Alabama 35160, Telephone 205/268-2709, do make the following statement or accusation: That all members of the present Congress of the United States of America have failed to abide by their oath of office and/or failed to abide by their Constitutional authority in that they have the sole authority to levy and collect tax for the sole purpose of paying the expenses of the Federal Government. I make this statement as mentioned above not with malice and not knowingly making a false statement.

1. The National Debt is the sole responsibility of Congress.

2. Congress has the sole authority to borrow money, to coin money, to set limits on the National Debt.

3. In the past several years Congress has increased the authority limit on several occasions.

4. The only authority to levy a national tax is that of the U.S. Congress. The only purpose of this tax is to pay the expenses of the operation of the U.S. Government.

5. Is that National "so-called" debt a legitimate debt or is it a selective debt? I am forced to pay all taxes authorized. I have been forced to pay a tax to pay interest on all of the borrowed money on the credit of the U.S. Government. There is no legitimate provision to pay this debt in a forceful manner or a voluntary one.

6. All persons who are employed by the National Government are paid according to their contract of employment. These wages are not on credit by in currency. Each member of Congress has been most generous in allowing their contracted pay, which in my opinion far greater than their worth. This pay is shifted from a tax to a debt with no provision to pay this debt in a forceful or voluntary manner. This is not fair to other citizens. The members of Congress should be forced to resign or abide by their oath and the Constitutional law.

In my opinion this borders on malfeasance—is it that? It is not my intent or purpose to support treason or act in a treasonal manner or support a revolution.

The Encyclopedia Americana, year 1955, is the source of the information of which I make reference.

Senator Helfin is the only member of the present Congress whom I have personally met and can identify by sight. I have great respect for him. I do not think that he or other members of the present Congress have, with willful intent, acted or failed to act in violation of the oath of office or failed to act according (collectively) with the sole responsibility and authority of levying tax and the collection thereof. The sole purpose is that of paying the expense of running the government of the U.S.A. I do say that all of you (members of Congress) have failed to carry out your collective and singular authority and sole responsibility in this regard. The National Debt is now the greatest in our history. The yearly budget is not in balance. There is no equitable provision made or allowed to reduce of pay the now National Debt or to balance the yearly budget. It is the sole responsibility of Congress to control both. No other branch of our government has this authority and responsibility, not even the President of the U.S.A. Yet most people blame the President in a political manner for most all things that they do not like. There are few people who like to pay taxes. However, if the tax is levied, each of us is required to pay that tax. There is no free meal.

Please allow me to meet with you at the earliest convenient time for you. I bear no malice toward any member of the present Congress and it is with deep regret that I feel compelled to make these serious charges in such a blunt manner. If I have made false accusations, it is not with intent.

AN OBSCURE PENNSYLVANIA CAVALRYMAN SAVED THE UNION AT GETTYSBURG

HON. BUD SHUSTER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. SHUSTER. Mr. Speaker, but for little-known Gen. David McMurtie Gregg—born in Huntingdon County, raised in Blair and Centre Counties—the North probably would have lost the Battle of Gettysburg, and the South could have gone to win the Civil War. Without this obscure cavalry officer there might not be a United States of America today.

That is the startling, yet inescapable conclusion of this meticulously researched and well-written book, "David Gregg—Pennsylvania Cavalryman" by Milton V. Burgess.

Combining his skills as a newspaperman and his interests as a historian, Milton V. Burgess—former editor of the Pittsburgh Sun-Telegraph and the Morrisons Cove Herald—has written a superb biography of Gen. David McMurtie Gregg. This is the story of a central Pennsylvania boy who was born into a distinguished Huntingdon County family, orphaned at an early age, graduated from the U.S. Military Academy at West Point, eventually rising to be described by his Civil War comrades as "the best all-'round cavalry officer that ever commanded a division in either Army."

Perhaps more importantly, this book marshals the evidence making the historical case that Gen. David Gregg, as commanding officer of the Union Army's 2d Cavalry Division at the Battle of Gettysburg, made the crucial daring decisions that blocked a Confederate victory in the greatest battle of the Civil War.

Mr. Burgess documents the inconspicuous fact that General Pickett's famous Confederate infantry charge up Cemetery Ridge was not intended by Robert E. Lee to be an unsupported frontal attack. Newspaper stories of the day and subsequent histories of the Civil War focused on the epic clash between the Blue and Gray infantries atop Cemetery Ridge as the key confrontation of the 3-day battle. When the Union Army repulsed Pickett's charge it won the Battle of Gettysburg. Lee was forced to retreat back into the South rather than march on to capture Philadelphia and New York, as he had planned.

Mr. Burgess clearly shows that Lee's strategy called for J.E.B. Stuart's cavalry to support Pickett's infantry charge with a simultaneous cavalry charge from behind the Union lines to split the Union infantry. And in fact, Pickett's charge did successfully penetrate the center of the Union line. Had Stuart's cavalry broken through to hook up with the Confederate infantry, the Union Army would have been split and badly defeated.

Mr. Burgess further establishes that the Confederate cavalry could not break through because Gen. David Gregg made a series of daring decisions that stopped them. From earlier battles against Stuart, Gregg correctly calculated where the Confederate cavalry would attempt to break through, and hid his troops in the woods to meet them. Because his force was too small, Gregg countermanded his superior officer's order and commandeered a cavalry brigade led by General Custer to augment his own troops. By directing Custer to abandon his orders and join him, Gregg seriously jeopardized his own military career. Had he failed he could have been court-martialed.

Together, Gregg and Custer led a surprise attack on Stuart's Confederate cavalry, which stopped them from driving through the Union lines to join the Confederate infantry on Cemetery Ridge, thereby defeating the Union Army.

Mr. Burgess interestingly depicts David Gregg's early life in Huntingdon, Blair, and Centre Counties; along with the apparition of his mother seen in a window by the Gregg children on the night she died 40 miles away at Bedford Springs; his military experience in the Indian Wars; the Civil War battles he fought following Gettysburg—including his troubled resignation from the Army before the war's end, and his later life as a civic leader in Pennsylvania. But clearly, the highlight of this book is the documented presentation of General Gregg's crucial role at Gettysburg.

Why would a general who demonstrably changed the role of American history not rank in the pantheon of famous Civil War heroes? For several reasons, according to Mr. Burgess: Gregg was reserved and modest rather than flamboyant and self-promoting like many other generals; he was operating behind the front lines at Gettysburg, while the news media was covering the massive infantry charge; he stopped the Confederate cavalry before it ever got into the heart of the battle; his superior officer did not give him the proper credit because Gregg had countermanded his orders; and General Gregg resigned from the Army before the end of the war, so he was not present to reap the accolades of final victory.

Nevertheless, Mr. Burgess compellingly makes the case that Gen. David Gregg, a son of central Pennsylvania, changed the course of history by his daring decisions at the Battle of Gettysburg.

If one must find a criticism, it is that there are almost too many facts to digest—dates, places, names, military units—tumbling out of the pages at you before you can catch your breath. But then, it is the weight of these facts, skillfully woven together by the author, that gives this book meaning.●

ARCHBISHOP O'CONNOR'S ST. PATRICK'S DAY HOMILY: A MORAL SUMMONS TO ACTION

HON. JOSEPH J. DioGUARDI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. DioGUARDI. Mr. Speaker, a fresh breeze is blowing and new hope is blooming forth this spring for a just and lasting peace for all of Ireland. The news reports from London and Dublin since March 17 suggest that those governments may be preparing new initiatives to deal with the "troubles" in those six of the divided Irish Provinces of Ulster's nine counties known as "Northern Ireland."

What was a major stimulus to this activity, and what should be a signal for an American peace initiative, is the Saint Patrick's Day homily of the Most Reverend John J. O'Conner, Archbishop of New York. In an act of great moral courage, Archbishop O'Connor made several commonsense observations concerning the tragic conflict in the north of Ireland. He made it plain that we must talk peace with all parties to the conflict. He reiterated the Holy Father's plea for an end "to the injustice, the oppression, the indignity and to the violence and the terrorism and the paralysis of fear." He further pointed out that there is a "legitimate struggle in Ireland for justice and human rights." I would add at this point that many Members of this House, and of the Senate as well, have actively pursued a positive, nonviolent quest for a just peace in Ireland. President Reagan himself, like Presidents Washington, Jefferson, and Kennedy, has expressed a sincere interest in seeing an end to the centuries old Anglo-Irish conflict, of which we are witnessing the most recent phase.

Archbishop O'Connor is no ivory tower theologian. As a retired rear admiral and former Chief of Navy Chaplains, he brings with him a perspective which allows him to see the broader implications of the Anglo-Irish conflict in terms of the North Atlantic Alliance's geopolitical need for a stable Ireland as a friend and neighbor. I refer to the attention of this House to my own paper on this subject, "On American Interests in Ireland," read into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on February 20, 1985 (pp. 2625 and 2626).

Archbishop O'Connor is offering to the Government of the United States, to the Congress, and to the executive branch moral guidance and very practical advice. The United States can no longer afford to ignore the troubles in Northern Ireland. It is a matter of American self-interest as well as of human moral necessity that we take the initiative, as we have done in so many other areas, in seeking to bring about a just and lasting peace in Ireland. In the archbishop's own words:

And finally, it is not for me to determine the political procedures for ending the conflict. I am a bishop, not a politician. But the moral course is clear, the time has come and is long overdue for those great nations of the world, truly dedicated to liberty and justice for all, to raise their voices loudly and clearly and unmistakably in the forums of the world or privately and quietly but persuasively, as they see fit, to demand that the oppression end, the slaughter cease. Which nation should lead the way but our own!

How can we ignore so clear a moral summons to action? London and Dublin have failed to bring peace to the north, let Washington find a new departure and win peace for our North Atlantic friends and allies.

I submit for the edification of this House the complete text of Archbishop O'Connor's truly historic 1985 Saint Patrick's Day homily, his moral summons to action:

ARCHBISHOP'S HOMILY

This is the official text of Archbishop O'Connor's homily at the St. Patrick's Day Mass, March 16.

Once again there are far too many distinguished visitors here to risk singling out any. I want to thank my brother bishops for being here and my brother priests. I am happy that the Scriptures today were read by two Christian Brothers since I owe so much of my vocation to the Christian Brothers, and we are particularly pleased that our senior archbishop, Archbishop Maguire, retired coadjutor of this archdiocese, is here and Bishop Furlong, one of the most senior and beloved bishops in the United States.

Many a tourist passes him by today without a glance and even the New Yorkers, aware of his presence, are dwindling in numbers. But Father Francis Duffy still stands watch in Times Square, a symbol of the 165th Regiment of New York, the famous Fighting 69th, of whom could well be said what was said of the Marines at Iwo Jima, that among them uncommon valor was a common virtue. The legendary 69th was highly instrumental in bringing the St. Patrick's Day Parade through its years of infancy. They are with us today, and we are grateful that they are. We shall be remembering them and particularly their fallen numbers in a very special way in this Mass. The statue of the extraordinarily legendary Father Francis P. Duffy is the only statue dedicated to a priest in the history of New York that stands on public property, and well deserved the honor.

We are equally grateful for the presence of the Ancient Order of Hibernians who did so much for the early Church of New York and so very much to launch the St. Patrick's Day Parade from the outset. I'm wearing today beneath my vestments the cross of Archbishop John Hughes of the County of Tyrone, the first archbishop of New York. And when the old St. Patrick's Cathedral was in danger of being burned and looted during the Nativist riots of 1844, Archbishop Hughes called one thousand men of the Ancient Order of Hibernians to protect the cathedral, and so they did. A plaque still stands in the Old St. Patrick's Cathedral that they defended, and it reads—"Erected to the memory of members of the Ancient Order of Hibernians of the City of New York who in April 1844, at the call of the Most Reverend John Hughes, rallied to the defense of the cathedral when it was threatened by the forces of bigotry and intolerance." Many years later the AOH gave a magnificient chalice to Cardinal Farley, Archbishop of New York, and that is the chalice that I will be using in this Mass today.

Now having with us both members of the Fighting 69th, whose heroism symbolizes that of millions of Americans who have served our country so well and of the thousands of chaplains who have served those who have served—and having here the AOH, symbolic of the tremendous contributions made to our country not only by Irish Catholics and others but by all Catholics and many others, including those in the military, all this provides an exceptionally appropriate setting for an announcement of historic import that I wish to make on this St. Patrick's Day of 1985.

On Nov. 24, 1917, because of World War I, Pope Benedict XV appointed another Patrick, Archbishop Patrick Hayes, then archbishop of New York, as the first Bishop Ordinary; as it was called, for the Roman Catholic Armed Forces of the United States. From that day until today, through Cardinal Spellman, Cardinal Cooke and myself, the archbishop of New York has had responsibility for all of our Catholic Armed Forces and Veterans Administration all over the world. I formally announce today, with humility, with great pleasure, that our Holy Father, Pope John Paul II, has decreed that His Excellency, here with us today, Archbishop Joseph T. Ryan, has been appointed Military Prelate or Bishop Ordinary of the Armed Forces in my place. For the first time since its birth in 1917, the Military Vicariate will cease to be associated with the archbishop of New York.

This announcement was decreed by the Holy See to be made public today, effective date will be March 25, one week from Monday and one week and one year after I assumed the archbishopric of New York. It is obvious that the Holy Father, recognizing my lack of familiarity with the military, determined that the mantle should pass to another, I warmly congratulate my good friend and loyal comrade, Archbishop Joseph T. Ryan. As I told him before Mass, he is still my subject for one more week.

I have selected today's Gospel reading with deliberation, "Simon, son of John, Simon Peter, do you love Me?" "Yes Lord, You know that I love You." "Simon, Simon, son of John, do you love Me?" "Yes Lord, You know that I love You." "Simon, John's son, Simon, Simon whom I have called Peter, do you love Me?" "Lord, You know everything, You know well that I love You."

There are marvelously profound analyses of these words to be found in the works of our Scripture scholars, and they give us solid foundation for explaining some of the most important teachings of our faith. But for our purposes today I suggest one very simple explanation of our Lord's questioning Peter three times. He simply wanted Peter to say over and over and then over again, I love you. For our Lord knew so very well the healing power of words, as He knew the destructive power of words. He knew how devastated Peter had been when in bitter words he had three times denied even knowing our Lord, much less being His friend. Now our Lord would begin the healing process—let words of love restore what words of bitterness had destroyed. Let words of loyalty begin the process of reconciliation ruptured by words of betrayal.

There has been horrible pain in Ireland for a long, long time. There has been bitter suffering. There has been oppression met with violence and violence met with further oppression. Men and women, and whole families, teenagers and little children of all political positions and all religious persuasions have paid dearly for months, for years, for generations. The Holy Father has pleaded passionately for an end to it all—to the injustice, the oppression, the indignity and to the violence and the terrorism and the paralysis of fear. And he has called for the use of the word, the healing word, the reconciling word, the word of reasoned dialogue.

Today the majority of us in this cathedral of St. Patrick will receive the Living Word, the Son of God in Holy Communion. Before we do so, after I have held His Body aloft with the words, "Behold the Lamb of God, behold Him who takes away the sins of the world," all will say the time-honored words, "Lord, I am not worthy but say only the word and I shall be healed," I know it is said that talk is cheap—it's not cheap when we use words of love, for these are reflections of the Divine Word, the Living Word who is Jesus the personification of love itself. Words are not cheap when we use the words of love because they demand of us so much sacrifice, make us so vulnerable.

I know it is argued by each party that other parties won't listen, but it is terribly difficult to hear over the sound of guns or tanks. I know that willingness to talk mere words can be perceived as a sign of weakness. Christ was at His strongest, not His weakest, despite all appearances to the contrary, when He cried out from the Cross, "Father forgive them for they know not what they do." And the good thief hanging on the cross, who had seemed to have been at his strongest when he was pillaging others, now at what appeared to be his weakest, was clearly stronger than ever before in his life when he asked forgiveness of Christ, the Son of God.

I know that sometimes the powerful of the world turn back conciliatory words with public scorn. Then the words must be repeated and repeated and repeated until the shallowness of the rebuff defeats itself. The whole world recognizes that the weak are strong in their initiatives for peace, and the strong are weak in the rejection of those initiatives.

My words today may please few and displease many. They are spoken from the depths of my being. They are a passionate plea to all. My actions today may please some and displease others. For following this Mass, as archbishop of New York, having carefully and prayfully conferred with hosts of advisers and listening to an exceptional number of validly concerned parties, I shall review the parade from the steps in front of the cathedral in honor of St. Patrick and of all Irish everywhere of whatever religious persuasion. I will do this with profound respect for my beloved predecessor, His Eminence, Cardinal Cooke, who two years ago made in honor and all integrity, with malice toward none and charity toward all, the judgment which he deemed appropriate for the circumstances of the day. In that same spirit I will do today what I believe should be done.

There are those good and sincere people who will be pained by my decision and who believe it implies support for violence and terrorism. Nothing could be farther from the truth. I reiterate and reemphasize publicly what I have said repeatedly before: I cannot accept, I cannot support or encourage support of the violence in Ireland by whomever perpetrated. And that includes both physical violence and moral violence. The violence of those who shed blood and engage in acts of terrorism, the violence of those who rob a people of justice, deprive them of their birthright and inflict on them continuing indignities. I cannot and I will not condemn the legitimate struggle in Ireland for justice and human rights. But I must condemn and I do condemn once again in the strongest terms, all acts of violence by whomever or against whomever they are perpetrated and all acts of terrorism as well.

And finally, it is not for me to determine the political procedures for ending the conflict. I am a bishop, not a politician. But the moral course is clear, the time has come and is long overdue for those great nations of the world, truly dedicated to liberty and justice for all, to raise their voices loudly and clearly and unmistakably in the forums of the world or privately and quietly but persuasively, as they see fit, to demand that the oppression end, the slaughter cease. Which nation should lead the way but our own!

Now let us pray—let us pray this feast day of St. Patrick; that all parties to the conflict, and we ourselves, will one day see in one another what St. Patrick saw wherever he looked—you will recall the legend on his breastplate; Christ above me, Christ beneath me, Christ beside me, Christ before me, Christ behind me, Christ all around me, Christ in the mouth of friend and stranger. God bless you all!●

JERSEY CITY'S GENERAL PULASKI MEMORIAL COMMITTEE MARKS GOLDEN ANNIVERSARY

HON. FRANK J. GUARINI

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. GUARINI. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday, April 27, the General Pulaski Memorial Committee of Jersey City will mark its 50th anniversary at its annual dinner dance being held at the High Hat in Bayonne, NJ.

This committee has been in continuous operation commemorating the contributions General Casimir Pulaski made during the American Revolution serving under the forces of Gen. George Washington.

Our Nation, on October 11, 1979, honored the 200th anniversary of the death of this great Polish patriot, who died as a result of wounds suffered during the battle of Savannah, as he selflessly led his famous cavalry unit, the Pulaski Legion, in the struggle for American independence.

To remain all those receiving this tribute, I would like to quote an article by perhaps we most foremost historian of Polish history in our area, Col. Anthony K. Podbielski, U.S.A. retired, a resident of Bayonne, NJ.

Brigadier General Casimir Pulaski's life, though short, was, however, overwhelming in his love of Poland, his love of freedom of man, what is popularly referred today as "human rights."

In 1752, at the age of 5, he began his association with equestrian play which ultimately concluded in warfare as a calvary officer and his final death astride his favorite steed at Savannah, Georgia, on October 11, 1779.

According to data researched by Edmund L. Kowalczyk of New England, Pulaski's horse was 7 years old. Taken by the British after his death, it was sold at public auction for 130 Guineas, on February 17, 1783, in New York City.

A certain "mystique" seems to be associated with the name of General Pulaski in the United States. More so than with other military personnel, especially foreigners. It may be because of his death on the field of battle, as a result of treachery by an American soldier. It may be because of the bravado, personal courage, his daring, his willingness to seek action and carry that action into the enemy's camp. The colonial army as such had only plans for cavalry action. It was Pulaski who had the practical experience in combat who strongly advocated combined cavalry and infantry attacks against the enemy. It was he who prepared infantry and cavalry drill regulations that served as a basis for "Baron" Von Steuben's ultimate troop training. Never was a military commander exposed to such treachery, indifference, even contempt, jealously, and delays as was Pulaski in his efforts to aid the colonists in their fight against England.

He was the George Patton of his time. It was Patton who relentlessly carried the fight into the German camp during World War II. "Keep pushing," was Patton's theme. Given a free hand Patton would have saved Eastern Europe militarily, at least. A keen student of warfare, Patton gleaned many a brilliant idea from General Pulaski's forays, patrols and cavalry tactics in New Jersey, Pennsylvania, South Carolina and Georgia. Whereas General Pulaski is rightfully referred to as the Father of American Cavalry, General Patton proved himself the father of modern armored American cavalry during his European campaigns against the Germans in North Africa and Europe.

We have yet to do considerable, painstaking research in the archives of Monmouth and Sussex counties, in order to appreciate Pulaski's efficient tactics during the Revolutionary War. His forays against the British in Charleston, South Carolina beg for methodical analysis and transcript.

Saturday's event will also mark a half-century of concentrated community effort by Polish-Americans who have been at the forefront of every mission of good will, whether it be aide to underprivileged nations, the Italian earthquake, or currently the Ethiopian Relief Fund Drive.

On May 3, 1985, the Republic of Poland will be celebrating the 194th anniversary of its Constitution Day. This is a most cherished remembrance for the citizens of Poland who on that day in 1791, without bloodshed, freely and willingly adopted their constitution.

The General Pulaski Memorial Committee appropriately has its headquarters in Hudson County, of which I am most pleased to serve as its representative in the 14th Congressional District.

It was at the turn of the century that the Poles began to arrive in America in increasing numbers, many after the uprising against Russia in 1830.

Indeed, there were immigrants who were dedicated to principles of freedom, democracy and opportunity seeking a better way of life for their families in the new world.

Many of the immigrants, inspired as they passed the Statue of Liberty, found shelter in Jersey City, appropriately called "The Queen City of Immigrants." It provided opportunity for jobs, resettlement, a good place to raise their families with good food and cheap rent and with religious leadership constantly prepared to assist.

Upon arrival in Hudson County, the immigrants, in addition to obtaining jobs and shelter for their families, began programs to preserve for themselves and their children, Polish traditions and cultures, entwined ever so closely with their love for their new land America.

In 1925 there were 32 Polish organizations in Jersey City, from cultural groups to religious and singing societies and political, patriotic and veterans groups.

Indeed they have been a proud group, participating in city functions and parties, putting their best foot forward with pride and integrity.

A high point for Hudson County's Polish-Americans, was the naming of the longest and highest viaduct in the world, devoted to the use of motor vehicles, the naming of the Pulaski Skyway connecting Jersey City and Newark. An engineering marvel, it is 3.5 miles long and spans both the Hackensack and Passaic Rivers.

It was in 1933 that New Jersey Governor A. Harry Moore designated the overhead road as General Pulaski Skyway after the petitions submitted by:

Stephen Kopycinski, chairman of the Polish-American Historical League, Dr. Abdon Piskorski, William Kwiatkowski, Edward Kozlowski, Stephanie Rawinski and Stephanie Pojawa, Edward Ruminski and John Karwowski, of the General Pulaski Post No. 9 Polish Legion, American Veterans, Edward Redmerski, commander of Casimir Pulaski Post V.F.W., Assemblyman Hejke of Jersey City, and Assemblyman Gutowski of Essex, together with the help of Mayor Frank Hague and the city commission, secured passage of the bill naming the Skyway.

Dedication ceremonies were held on October 11, 1933, the anniversary of the death of General Pulaski.

In 1935 and 1936 one of the largest parades ever in the history of Jersey City was conducted leading to New York City's first Pulaski Day Parade. It was at the persuasion of Stephen Kopycinski that a General Pulaski Memorial Committee was formed. He became its first chairman.

The next year, New York's first Pulaski program was organized by the General Krzyzanowski Memorial Committee with the newly-organized Jersey City General Pulaski Memorial Committee. It was decided at that time that New York and New Jersey would conduct an annual parade during the month of October on New York's Fifth Avenue and that the two states would take turns naming its grand marshal.

The first parade, in October 1937, began at the foot of Fifth Ave. from the Washington Arch at Washington Square Park. More than 20,000 marchers, divided into 12 divisions, represented Hudson County.

The Pulaski Memorial Committee showed its love of freedom and Poland when they conducted a drive and donated 10 ambulances to the Polish Army in 1942. A ceremony was conducted in front of St. Patrick's Cathedral with Francis Cardinal Spellman blessing the ambulances.

During World War II the committee sent money, food, clothing and medicine to Poland, while that valiant nation was struggling for survival in wartime.

As time went on, the Pulaski Skyway showed signs of neglect and the General Pulaski Skyway identification insignia disappeared and was replaced with just skyway signs. Many showed their concern. It took the valiant leadership and hard work of Assemblyman Stephen (Bobby) Kopicinski, Jr., the son of the late Stephen Kopicinski, Sr., the first committee chairperson, to lead a fight to have General Pulaski's name appropriately placed on the roadway.

Through formal action in the New Jersey State Assembly, Kopicinski was instrumental in having the proper authority prepare new signs in time for the re-dedication on Sunday, September 17, 1978.

Medallions were struck, designed and executed by members of the committee, with the first presented to Lt. General Edward L. Rowny, who represented the President of the United States Jimmy Carter. General Rowny is known for his great work in NATO and has represented the United states in discussions to maintain peace in Europe.

Each year, on October 11, the Pulaski Committee, with officials, places a wreath of flowers at the General Pulaski plaque on the skyway.

The General Pulaski Committee is pleased to note that three children of Edward and Alice Litke, members of the committee, were honored by being named "Miss Polonia", Janice in 1972, Therese in 1977 and Dolores in 1983.

Over the years, Jersey City has been represented by four grand marshals, namely John F. Saturnewicz, 1939, Stephen J. Kopicinski, 1947 Charles J. Witkowski in 1979 and Ernest Zima in 1967.

Stephen Kopycinski was the youngest grand marshal ever to lead the Pulaski Day Parade.

Recently, working with some members of the Pulaski Day Committee, specifically Peter Nowak, I have asked the New Jersey State Department of Transportation to consider lighting up the Pulaski Skyway. Nearby, the Verrazano Bridge and Bayonne Bridge have a tiara of lights on its super structure which can be seen for many miles around. Indeed, the lighting up of the Pulaski Skyway will add more luster to the contributions of the courageous general from Poland who came to help an unknown group of revolutionaries under the direction of General George Washington because he loved freedom and believed in the dignity of all individuals.

I wish to reiterate my great admiration to the General Pulaski Memorial Committee members, to the hundreds of thousands who have marched over the years, and to its founder, Stephen Kopycinski, and his family, to the people of Jersey City and Hudson County and all those who raised funds for this extraordinary annual event.

Indeed, the parade is a tribute not only to General Pulaski, but to the gallant sons and daughters of Polonia who have fought and bled for freedom's cause. I wish to extend congratulations also to this year's officers:

President Stanley Rotepel, Honorary President Felix Gabrush, Vice Presidents Marian Morawski, Joseph Sluka, Eleanor Torick, Lucy Wolff, and Harold Zielaznicki; Treasurer Michael Kopacz; Recording Secretary Janine Kulbatski; Corresponding Secretary Maryjane Badach; Chaplain Rev. Leonard A. Miodowski; Trustees Alice Litke, Edward Litke, Joseph Plonski, Donna Rotepel and Doris Tacik; Sergeant at Arms Edward Wlodyga.

I also wish to give my special thanks to Edward Baltarzuk, who is historian of the General Pulaski Memorial Committee for being my "Ambassador without portfolio," bringing my message, in October 1983, personally to the great Lech Walesa at his home in Gdansk, Poland.,

Baltarzuk and his lovely wife, Dorothy, met with Lech Walesa on October 19, 1983. They presented him with a copy of my testimony before the Congress of the United States regarding the Nobel Peace Prize and copies of the Jersey Journal announcement.

At that time Walesa gave Ed a message in Polish to deliver to me, which was:

Free people of the world are our brothers."

Walesa told Baltarzuk in Polish:

I have struggled for human rights and it is just as important to fight for human rights as to win."

Regarding the Nobel prize, Walesa said:

The prize does not belong to me but to the valiant and gallant people of Poland.

In the message Ed Baltarzuk delivered for me to Walesa I expressed appreciation for Mr. Walesa's letter to me which I consider to be of such historic significance that I wish to share it herein:

Gdansk, 7th October 1981, Frank J. Guarini, 14th District, New Jersey. Dear Mr. Guarini. Thank you very much for your cordial letter and tribute you paid to me but first of all I am happy to hear that you approve of the activities of our independent self-governed union.

All of us are very grateful for the moral support of aims and tasks we declared and which must be of concern to all who are interested in justice.

Thanks to your letter and many others from the U.S.A. and all over the world our union is becoming stronger and aware that our struggle for human rights and dignity we are not alone. It is the source of hope for us that these aims should be achieved not in Poland only but also in other countries.

I am absolutely convinced that the proposal of mutual cooperation you suggested and I accept with great pleasure will service the cause of peace, justice, and freedom for all the people.

I hope that my visit to the U.S.A. will help to achieve our aims.

I am grateful, Sir, that you supported my nomination for the 1981 Nobel Peace Prize. This is a matter of great importance, particularly for the whole of "Solidarity" as the union, much more than for me personally.

Thank you for the American flag and the photos you enclosed.

I extend our best wishes for you and all the "Solidarity's friends in the U.S.A. I remain, Sincerely, Lech Walesa, Chairman of NSZZ "Solidarnosn".

I am sure my colleagues here in the House of Representatives wish to join me in this salute to the memory of General Pulaski, who advanced $50,000 of his own money, equipping organizations, the America Legion of Horse Warriors, creating the famous Pulaski Legion, but also for his involvement in combat in Egg Harbor, NJ, and other areas before he died from the effects of gangrene caused by imbedded bullets at the age of 31 on October 11, 1779.

Indeed Pulaski died as he lived, a noble, undaunted warrior, fighting the battles of liberty and of the republic.

His memory is entitled to our veneration as his life forms an item in the price of our independence.

Americans all should always carry with us the memories of General Pulaski's noble life and heroic deeds. As father of the American Cavalry, he taught us to remember that each member is the greatest asset we have, guarding it zealously least we lose it and become slaves of some foreign usurper.

The need for his constant inspiration is reflected in the following poem:

Powstan Putaski, prezetrzyj ewe powieka,
Bo, jak nie wstanesz, zginiemy na wieki. . .
Arise Pulaski, rub your eyes.
For if you do not wake, we shall be lost for years thereby. . .

William McDonald very concisely describes General Pulaski in this poem:

When freedom raised her standard sheet,
And drums the call to battle beat,
When rose the din of conflict shrill
From Concord field and Bunker hill
Who heard the summons o'er the wave?
Pulaski brave, Pulaski brave.

It has been said, "To live in the hearts of those you love * * * is not to die." General Pulaski in word and in deed will live forever.●

COLLEGE FRATERNITIES AND SORORITIES

HON. THOMAS N. KINDNESS

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. KINDNESS. Mr. Speaker, the Nation's college and university fraternities and sororities are an integral part of the American educational system. As with other nonprofit organizations, their existence is dependent upon their tax-exempt status.

College and university fraternities and sororities have tax-exempt status under present law, but are classified as social clubs for this purpose. The legislation I am introducing today would amend section 501(c) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 so that such fraternities and sororities would have their own category of tax exemption.

Under present law, college and university fraternities and sororities are classified for tax purposes in the same category as country clubs and other types of social clubs. While most tax-exempt organizations' unrelated business income is taxable, social clubs are generally taxed on their investment income as well.

My legislation would change the definition of "college and university fraternity and sorority" to provide that these organizations receive the same tax treatment as other tax-exempt nonprofit organizations. I urge my col-

BROWN'S DIEKEN BOWS OUT AT 36

HON. EDWARD F. FEIGHAN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. FEIGHAN. Mr. Speaker, all of northeastern Ohio joins with me in honoring Cleveland Browns football star and community humanitarian Doug Dieken, who retired last week after a long and distinguished career.

I have known Doug for several years and he is by far one of the most compassionate and caring civil leaders I have ever met. He gives as much off the field as he does on the field. His work with local charities is unequaled; his community activism is unlimited; and his pride in our area is unsurpassed.

In short, Doug Dieken is more than all all-star player: he is an all-star person.

I would like to insert in the RECORD the following tribute to Doug Dieken which was written by the Plain Dealer's Tony Grossi. This excellent article sums up why Doug Dieken is such a special part of the northeastern Ohio community.

[From the Cleveland Plain Dealer, Apr. 18, 1985]

BROWNS' DIEKEN BOWS OUT AT 36

(By Tony Grossi)

A part of him wanted to stay, and a part of him didn't.

A part of him never achieved the two major goals he set as an athlete, and a part of him achieved more off the field than any professional athlete in Cleveland history.

Doug Dieken, the player, retired yesterday. Doug Dieken, community humanitarian and giver to most any charitable organization, did not.

"I definitely will stay in the Cleveland community because it's my home," Dieken said.

For 14 years, Dieken played the left tackle position at the same high standards set previously by Hall of Famer Lou Groza and All-Pro Dick Schafrath.

Never missing a game, Dieken finished his career with a consecutive-game streak of 203, eighth on the all-time National Football League list. But the pains absorbed in 14 years of injuries caught up with his 36-year-old body.

"My brain convinced my body that the pain is greater than I want it to be," Dieken conceded.

Dieken's reputation as a practical joker preceded him everywhere. However, at a news conference yesterday, the jokes were few and Dieken, with watery eyes, read from a written script his poignant remembrances of a stellar career.

In part, Dieken said, "Walking in here today was a lot tougher than those bus trips from Pittsburgh . . . I really like this city, which I call my home, a city of much pride, determination and sincerity. As an athlete, I've admired its desire to gain respect . . . Obviously, this is a city that cares.

"I'm somewhat embarrassed that 'Holding . . . 73' has become a household phrase. I am proud that in 14 years, we haven't seen a quarterback carried off the field from a blind-side hit.

"In finishing, I hope my career has nearly spanned the transition from one championship season to the next. I do believe this is in the best interests of the Browns . . . I would never stand in the way of my teammates' goals and one that was mine—a Super Bowl."

Dieken said his two goals as a player were never met—a victory at Pittsburgh's Three Rivers Stadium and a (league) championship.

Perhaps the greatest individual thrill experienced by the former tight end from the University of Illinois occurred in a 1983 victory at the Stadium against the Houston Oilers. In that game, Dieken grabbed a 14-yard touchdown pass from Paul McDonald on a fake field goal.

Dieken was saluted by Browns President Art Modell and coach Marty Schottenheimer.

"Maybe he hasn't played on a championship team," the coach said, "but Doug Dieken is a true champion."

Added Modell, "In all the years I've been in the game, I don't know of anyone who had as much courage, who had the ability to play hurt and who had such a commitment to excellence. Equally important, nobody in the history of this franchise has done as much in his community off the field as Doug Dieken."

Modell said Dieken has contributed to 42 charitable causes over the years "and not once has this man ever declined an appearance for charity reasons."

The Browns' majority owner presented Dieken with a gold watch with the inscription, "To Doug. You gave 100% of yourself to the Browns. Thanks."

Playing true to form, Dieken held on tight.

Of his future, Dieken said he will pursue "a career . . . not a job." He revealed after the news conference that he has applied for the Browns' radio job vacated when Gib Shanley retired after the 1984 season.●

NATIONAL MUSIC WEEK

HON. BARNEY FRANK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, on April 11 Al Turgeon and Jum Judge of the Fall River, Musicians Union Local 216 visited me regarding the 62d annual observance of National Music Week, sponsored by the National Federation of Music Clubs [NFMC] to be held May 5 through 12 in communities across the United States.

I would like to share this article titled "National Music Week to be Observed" which expresses the theme for 1985 "Music—a Source of National Pride."

The article follows:

[From the International Musician, Mar. 1985]

NATIONAL MUSIC WEEK TO BE OBSERVED

The sixty-second annual observance of National Music Week, sponsored by the National Federation of Music Clubs (NFMC), will be held May 5 through 12 in communities across the U.S.

Founded in 1924 as "a voluntary expression of the public's interest in music" by the late Charles M. Tremaine, head of the National Bureau for the Advancement of Music, this special week had President Calvin Coolidge as its first honorary chairman and has since drawn the support of each succeeding Chief Executive.

"Music—A Source of National Pride" will be the theme of this year's observance of National Music Week, which receives funding and cooperation from the American Federation of Musicians and numerous other national music organizations. On the local level individual communities will take charge of coordinating activities such as concerts at a variety of locations, programs on radio and TV, educational talks and media coverage of events. In addition, community members are urged to ask their local and state governing bodies to issue National Music Week proclamations.

Because local participation is so crucial to the success of National Music Week, the NFMC will present awards of merit to the organizations and media outlets that made the greatest efforts to disseminate information about the week throughout their communities. Also counting toward awards will be outstanding efforts to enlist the involvement of local businesses, schools, PTAs, libraries, service clubs and religious institutions.

Those interested in making award nominations for work on behalf of National Music Week should contact the National Federation of Music Clubs, 1336 North Delaware Street, Indianapolis, Indiana 46202.●

NATIONAL LIBRARY WEEK

HON. CARDISS COLLINS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 17, 1985

● Mrs. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my friend and colleague, Major Owens, for sponsoring this special order on libraries and library issues. Libraries are important institutions that promote knowledge to enrich and improve our lives. Their outstanding work is deserving of support.

There has never been a greater need for a well-informed public than today. In our rapidly changing world, we have grown to rely on libraries for the information we need to make day-to-day decision in our professional and personal lives.

However, we cannot expect libraries to grow and expand with the world unless we offer them financial support.

President Reagan loves to talk about how the illiteracy rate in this country has declined greatly, and we owe thanks to our libraries for that accomplishment.

But what he doesn't tell you is that the Reagan administration has proposed zero funding for library programs during each of the past 3 years, and he plans to try it again in fiscal year 1986.

Reagan wants to eliminate funding for the Library Services and Construction Act, though this act was reauthorized for funding last fall.

He also wants to end postal subsidies for materials mailed to the blind and physically handicapped, forcing libraries to pick up the slack and pay the postage. The problem is libraries have no budget allocation for this type of postage, so patrons will end up being denied these valuable services.

The administration is also supporting rate increases for telecommunications lines used to transmit computer information. Libraries will face 50 to 100 percent increases in user charges, eliminating smaller libraries from current information bases.

In my home State of Illinois, there are more than 3,000 libraries employing over 14,000 people. I am concerned about the impact of these cuts from both an economic and educational viewpoint.

I oppose these cuts and other proposed reductions in funding for libraries. Public support of libraries represents an investment in people and communities, and I want to see that investment maintained.

Though we are all striving to tighten our belts in these days of deficit spending, the continuing education of our citizens through libraries is something that cannot be sacrificed.●

STANGELAND MARKET-ORIENTED 1985 FARM BILL

HON. ARLAN STANGELAND

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. STANGELAND. Mr. Speaker, the Reagan administration has provided Congress with a 1985 farm bill proposal that would be disastrous for Minnesota farmers. Under the banner of market orientation, the administration's plan calls for pain, not profit, for American agriculture.

On the other hand, there are those who wishfully think the answer to all of agriculture's problems will be achieved by merely cutting back our production. What do they think we have been doing? While we have implemented supply management programs in 5 of the last 6 years, our export competitors have expanded both acreage and production. At the same time, our world export market share in wheat has dropped from almost one-half to about one-third while our export competitors have gained by the same amount.

Both of these approaches would put American agriculture on a sure fire course for self-destruction. Sometime down the road the Reagan administration's proposal would certainly make our exports price competitive—but it would be a joyless victory after counting the number of farmers who would be sacrificed in the process. There is also no question that strict mandatory production controls would ultimately raise farm prices. But would it be worth laying idle 40 to 50 percent of the richest cropland in the world? Saying goodbye to our hard earned export markets? Dashing any hopes for significant market growth in the future? Adding American agriculture to the list of slowly dying U.S. industries that have already conceded defeat to foreign competition?

The Reagan administration's farm bill proposal isn't truly market oriented because it doesn't call for our Government to fight as hard for our farmers in the world market as other governments fight for their farmers. Those who only advocate strict mandatory production controls want to give up without even trying to fight back.

Farmers aren't quitters. Most have had to fight for everything they've got. I think they just want to see our Government start implementing policies that work for them instead of against them.

It's about time our Government commit itself to matching foreign governments subsidy for subsidy. The cornerstone of this year's market-oriented farm bill should be to immediately transfer the pain of unfair trade policies from our farmers to those governments, both foreign and our own, which are guilty of creating agriculture's problems.

WHEAT, FEED GRAINS TITLE

MARKET-ORIENTED LOAN

The market-oriented loan is a concept which, if implemented, would immediately make our exports price competitive and still protect farm income. Under the market-oriented loan plan, commodity loan rates would be maintained for the 1986 crop at the 1985 levels. However, farmers could sell the crop under loan at any time during the 9-month loan period and would only be required to repay based upon the world market price. The farmer would pocket the difference between the loan rate and the repayment rate.

The market-oriented loan approach has two overriding advantages. First of all, it protects farm income. By maintaining the loan rate at the 1985 crop level, farm prices and income will not suffer as they would under the administration's proposal.

Second, and of greater importance in the long run, it significantly reduces Government involvement in the grain business. For years, both our export competitors and grain-buying nations have taken advantage of us because we have pursued agricultural policies that have made us the world's great stockpiler and residual supplier. Our willingness to hold grain has allowed our export competitors to gradually chip away an ever larger portion of our world market share. In addition, it encourages foreign consuming nations to buy hand to mouth and simply let us worry about holding reserve stocks. In recent years, this policy has dearly cost our farmers in both lost markets and lower prices.

By moving this grain into commercial channels instead of continuing to allow surplus stocks hang over the market and depress prices, the following are just a few of the positive results that would occur: burdensome surplus stocks would be removed, foreign governments would incur enormous costs for continuing their export subsidies, our grain would immediately be price competitive in the export market, lost foreign markets could be regained, farm income would be protected, and the groundwork would be laid to ensure our farmers will fully benefit in the future from American agriculture's comparative advantage in the world market.

The market-oriented loan will allow American agriculture's transition to a truly market-oriented, and market-winning, approach without the devastating consequences that would otherwise occur under the administration's plan.

The market-oriented loan then can be viewed as a cushioning tool to get us where we need to go without throwing farmers off the farm in the process. Also, its ability to immediately make our exports price competitive should improve the prospects for a much quicker turnaround in world commodity prices by discouraging production in competitor nations and enhancing demand.

TARGET PRICES

In addition to the marketing loan, target prices should continue to be utilized to maintain farm income.

Target prices for the 1986 crop would be set at the national average cost of production, including returns to land. The cost of production determination would have to be approved by the National Agricultural Cost of Production Standards Review Board—made up of producers representing all regions of the country—but in any case may not be set at less than $4.75 per bushel for wheat and $3.45 per bushel for corn. Target prices for other feed grains would be set at a level which is fair and reasonable in relation to corn.

Many believe that the structure of past farm programs—with benefits tied directly to the amount a farmer produces—has actually worked to discourage our efforts to control overproduction. With no limitation on the level of production eligible for deficiency payment protection, financially strapped farmers are forced to grow as much as they can on the acres they are not required to idle. This results in added input costs for the farmer, generally higher yields on the cropped acreage, surplus production nationwide despite the acreage reduction program in effect, and continuing depressed prices.

For this reason, consideration should be given to offering target price protection on only that percentage of a farmer's production deemed necessary to meet domestic needs, or 50 percent of the farmer's acreage base and proven yield, whichever is higher.

FARMER'S COLA

Once the 1986 crop target price has been established, farmers should be assured of future COLA adjustments in the target price level to guarantee that this important income protection tool will keep pace with increased living expenses.

The farmer's COLA could be determined in the same manner as the cost-of-living adjustments for Social Security and other Federal programs, with a modification to account for long-term yield increases.

Had such a formula been in effect, the 1985 wheat and corn target prices would have been increased by 8 cents and 6 cents per bushel, respectively.

SOYBEAN TITLE

The soybean program would be maintained as provided for under current law.

The loan rate is established by taking 75 percent of the national average price for the preceding 5 marketing years, excluding the high and low years, but not less than $5.02 per bushel.

SUGAR TITLE

The sugar program would be maintained as provided for under current law.

Loan rates—raw sugar basis—would be only slightly adjusted from the 1985 crop support level of 18 cents per pound. Loan rates would be established at 18.5 cents per pound in 1986, 19 cents in 1987, 19.25 cents in 1988, and 19.5 cents in 1989.

The use of fees, duties, and quotas, if necessary, would continue to be used to prevent the forfeiture of sugar to the Goverment.

Unlike most commodities in the farm bill, sugar is a deficit crop. We currently produce only about two-thirds of the sugar that is needed to satisfy domestic demand. Therefore, the sugar program should not mirror other commodity programs which may be addressing a surplus situation, as is being proposed in the administration's farm bill.

DAIRY TITLE

The dairy industry has been forced to undergo a severe period of adjustment in recent years. Although the Dairy Diversion Program proved successful in reducing surplus production and in lowering the cost of the Dairy Price Support Program, its expiration on April 1 combined with the number of cows now ready to be milked does not bode well for the future.

The dairy sector has traditionally been the least concentrated and has overwhelmingly been made up of relatively smaller, family-sized dairying operations. With the continuing threat of support cuts in the future that will be further encouraged by technological advances that could drive many smaller farmers out of business, it is important that some limits be placed on the amount of surplus milk being purchased from enormously large-scale operations—many of which are operated solely for tax shelter purposes.

For this reason, I believe that consideration should be given to a three-tier price support program for dairy farmers depending on their annual level of production. A support price of $13.10 per hundredweight would apply for production from any producer up to 1 million pounds per year, a $10.10 support level would be offered for production from any farm in the 1-2 million pound range, and a $7.10 price support would be provided for dairy farmers in excess of 2 million pounds annually.

Because the CCC would pay the lower support levels on the milk equivalent production coming from larger farms, milk handlers would be compelled to offer lower prices as a farmer's annual production exceeded the 1 million and 2 million pound thresholds.

Such a plan would also encourage more aggressive marketing of milk and dairy products by milk handlers, instead of forcing the dairy farmers themselves to bear the major burden of promotion costs.

In light of the continuing budgetary pressures that threaten additional price support cuts, and anticipated technological advances that could further aggravate the supply-and-demand imbalance in dairy, it is important that Congress make future price support modifications with the small- and medium-sized efficient family farmer in mind.

CONSERVATION TITLE

LONG-TERM ACREAGE CONSERVATION RESERVE

During the export boom of the 1970's, the amount of cropland harvested by U.S. farmers increased by 56 million acres.

To assist American agriculture in coping with new market realities brought on by world recession, an overvalued American dollar, the multiyear effects of past embargoes, and increased production from our competitors, I propose that a 10-year long-term acreage conservation reserve be established to take some 20 million acres of erodible cropland out of production.

This program will achieve two goals. First, it will focus on retiring that portion of cropland which is most responsible for wind and water erosion problems. In so doing, benefits will accrue in such areas as water quality, wildlife and waterfowl habitat, flood damage, dredging costs, timber availability, reservoir lifespan, and various soil and water conservation goals.

Furthermore, by allowing farmers to bid in highly erodible acres that have been cropped in 3 of the past 5 years, such a program will decrease production of agricultural commodities, lower the cost of commodity price support programs, reduce surpluses, and strengthen prices received by farmers.

SODBUSTER

In addition to the long-term conservation reserve, I believe we need strict "sodbuster" language to ban any type of Federal price or income support for commodities grown by farmers who plow up new land for crop production that is classified as highly erodible. The ban would extend to, among other things, crop insurance protection and Farmers Home Administration loans, in addition to traditional farm program benefits.

This ban would not apply to land cultivated for crops during the decade prior to enactment, to crops planted before enactment of the law, or to any crops produced under a conservation system approved by a local soil conservation district.

TRADE TITLE

Key concepts: First, prohibit agricultural embargoes under any circumstances, other than war, in which case farmers shall be compensated according to their loss in export market share. Second, firm commitement to match foreign export competitors subsidy-for-subsidy. Third, reciprocity—U.S. Government must demand open access to export markets and not permit other countries to continue benefiting from liberal access to our market while they prevent our farmers from selling in their own country.

CURRENCY ADJUSTMENT FARM EXPORT PROGRAM

Federal deficits have increased real interest rates, encouraged an overvalued dollar, and damaged the competitiveness of American farm exports in the world market.

In addition, while farmers—as major exporters—may suffer more than any other sector from an overvalued dollar, their petroleum-based input costs do not reflect the import advantages normally associated with a strong curreny as world oil prices are denominated in U.S. dollars.

This administration has presided over a 30- to 40-percent appreciation in our currency. No businessman—including farmers—can successfully operate in a wildly fluctuating environment that prevents effective long-term planning. If the administration wants to make farmers depend soley on the world market, then it must bear the responsibility for Government actions—deficits, Federal Reserve Board policies, and so forth—or volatile international economic forces—investment flows which alter currency values—which directly impact on our farmers' export competitiveness.

In short, farmers have a right to know what is expected of them and not be subject to extreme currency valuations.

To accomplish this, I propose that a 5-year currency index be established to show the historical relationship between the U.S. dollar and the currencies of our major grain export competitors. Whenever the value of the U.S. dollars exceeds the 5-year rolling average, the CCC would be authorized to compensate for this difference with surplus government-owned food stocks or cash payments, whichever is more efficient and cost effective.

Everyone acknowledges the damages effect an overvalued dollar has had on farm exports. If American farmers are now expected to compete against foreign farmers who have been given a 40-percent currency exchange advantage, then a currency adjustment program should be incorporated into the farm bill that will establish a "level playing field" and allow our farmers' export competitiveness to reflect the true comparative advantage of American agriculture.

BARTER

Those who scoff at the potential role for barter in world trade are guilty of the same textbook-type of thinking that cannot explain the allegedly inefficient imposition of Japanese import restrictions or European Community export subsidies.

The fact of the matter is that roughly 10 percent of all world trade is now conducted through barter and our national export policies must be adjusted to reflect these present realities in the world market.

I believe that a $500 million barter fund should be authorized as a separate revolving account within the Commodity Credit Corporation. The fund would be drawn upon to cover costs associated with bartering surplus agricultural commodities and would be replenished upon receipt by the General Services Administration—from the USDA—of any critical minerals, strategic materials, or other barter trade obtained for our national defense stockpiles.

A strong, responsibly run CCC barter program offers the advantages of reducing Government-owned commodity surpluses, increasing farm exports to cash-poor countries, reducing overall farm program costs, and strengthening commodity prices.

Of course, the establishment of an efficient mechanism for conducting barter trade will further serve the country by permitting an improved method of obtaining critical minerals crucial to our national defense and also the acquisition of oil for storage in the strategic petroleum reserve.

ETHANOL

The U.S. ethanol industry is still in its infancy. But if the market for ethanol consumption can be increased, this renewable energy resource could have enormous market implications for our farmers.

For example, in the United States, approximately 100 billion gallons of gasoline are consumed annually. If that gasoline were blended with 10 percent ethanol, it would require the use of 4 billion bushels of corn. Approximately 8 billion bushels of corn are produced each year in the United States.

Unfortunately, highly subsidized foreign producers are exploiting loopholes in current law which threaten the stability and further development of our domestic ethanol industry.

Congress must amend our trade laws to close the loopholes which presently permit tariff-free ethanol imports from Brazil and Spain.

An enormous opportunity presents itself for the ethanol industry as the Environmental Protection Agency [EPA] decreases the maximum lead content in gasoline during the coming months. It has been estimated that this regulatory change could require eight times the 1984 supply of alcohol for octane boosting purposes in order to eliminate U.S. leaded gasoline.

However, it is crucial that Congress act now to amend our trade laws so that this increased demand for ethanol is satisfied by our domestic industry and benefits American farmers, instead of producers from Brazil or the EEC.

CONCLUSION

Clearly a change is needed. Ronald Reagan has spent 3½ times the amount spent during the Carter administration on direct Federal farm payments—deficiency, diversion, PIK, disaster, and storage payments—yet today's farm economy is in shambles.

But you can't throw the baby out with the bath water. And you can't gut the present farm programs unless you have something better to put in its place.

The administration has emphasized that the 1985 farm bill must be "market-oriented." While I strongly agree that we need to expand exports, the issue of market-orientation must not be used as an excuse to slash farm price supports.

Just slashing farm price supports does not make it a market-oriented farm program.

It is important that we strive to win new foreign markets and allow our farmers the opportunity to fully profit from America's comparative advantage in agriculture. But it is also important to remember that farmers have been burned before after being told by national policymakers to produce for the export market.

During the Nixon-Ford administration farmers were instructed to "plant fence-row-to-fence-row," but the oilseed embargo of 1973 reduced our farmers' share of world trade in soybeans from 90 percent to 50 percent.

Again, during the Carter administration, farmers were encouraged to "feed the world," but the 1980 Soviet grain embargo cut our share of the Soviet export market from 72 percent to 18 percent and further eroded America's reputation as a reliable supplier.

Now under the Reagan administration, farmers are once again being told to produce for the export market. But 4 years of record budget deficits and Federal Reserve Board monetary policies have appreciated our currency to the point where our export competitors have been given a 30- to 40-percent price advantage.

Farmers are by their very nature market oriented. They want to be able to sell in the marketplace and receive a price that covers the cost of their production plus a fair profit. But there is no such thing as a free world market in agriculture today and we must craft a 1985 farm bill that clearly recognizes the trade practices of other nations.

Without a thoughtful long-term agricultural plan to put some much-needed income into the pockets of our farmers, rural America is poised for a massive shakeout that I fear will have severe societal consequences through this century.

In addition, the rural economic disruption and dislocation caused by hard working families being forced off the farm would have a far worse effect on the deficit than the relatively minor expenditures that are needed now to provide some stability to our farms and rural areas.

Agriculture is the foundation of our economy. When farmers make a profit, they put that money right back into the economy by purchasing equipment, supplies, and other inputs which, in turn, create jobs and make our country more prosperous. Therefore, it is ultimately in the best interests of every citizen in our country that we have a strong agricultural sector.

Even during these times of severe budget constraints, I remain optimistic that a strong 1985 farm bill is achievable. As a senior member of the House Agriculture Committee, I intend to continue fighting during this year's congressional deliberations for what our farmers need—strong farm prices, reduced interest rates, low inflation, and fair trade laws.●

REMOVING THE SOCIAL SECURITY TRUST FUNDS FROM THE UNIFIED FEDERAL BUDGET

HON. C.W. BILL YOUNG

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Mr. Speaker, this morning I had the opportunity to testify before the Ways and Means Subcommittee on Social Security in support of H.R. 1385, legislation I've introduced to accelerate the removal of the Social Security trust funds from the unified Federal budget.

The Social Security trust funds were established 50 years ago as an autonomous, self-supported program with independent trust funds. Despite this clear separation from other Federal accounts, there are some in Congress who have suggested that Social Security cost-of-living adjustments should be reduced or eliminated to lower the Federal deficit.

As I told the committee this morning, it's wrong to suggest this, because regardless of how much money is in the trust funds, it cannot be used to fund national defense programs, build roads and bridges, fund education or farm programs, or finance the interest on our national debt.

I have, for this reason, consistently opposed any attempts to tamper with Social Security benefits as a means to provide for phony budgetary savings. It's my hope that the Ways and Means Committee and the House will act promptly on my legislation to remove the Social Security trust funds from the unified budget and reassure our Nation's 36 million Social Security recipients that they will receive their full cost-of-living adjustments as scheduled on January 1, 1986.

The statement I presented to the committee follows:

TESTIMONY OF CONGRESSMAN BILL YOUNG BEFORE THE WAYS AND MEANS SUBCOMMITTEE ON SOCIAL SECURITY, APRIL 23, 1985

Mr. Chairman, I want to thank you and the members of your Committee for allowing me to testify this morning in support of H.R. 1385, legislation I introduced to accelerate the removal of the social security trust funds from the unified federal budget.

As you know, the National Commission on Social Security Reform and the Ways and Means Committee supported this proposal in 1983. The Social Security Amendments of 1983 included a provision to remove the social security trust funds from the unified federal budget, but not until 1993. My legislation, Mr. Chairman, would make this accounting change effective in fiscal year 1986.

The social security system was established 50 years ago as an autonomous, self-supported program with independent trust funds financed by employee and employer contributions. Congress has been careful throughout the years to keep the social security system independent from general Treasury accounts to insulate the program from political and budgetary pressures. Unfortunately, social security recipients in recent years have all too often been held hostage by Congress.

Once again this year, it has been suggested that social security cost-of-living adjustments should be eliminated or reduced to lower the federal deficit. This is an attempt not to effect changes for the long-term betterment of the social security system, but to meet short-term budgetary goals.

Throughout the program's history, the system has maintained, for the most part, a trust fund surplus. To capitalize on this situation, President Johnson began in 1969 to incorporate the social security trust funds into the unified Federal budget so that the surpluses would offset the mounting federal deficits. This practice will continue as long as the Federal government is allowed to maintain this accounting system.

Changes to the social security system should only be considered by Congress to ensure the program's financial stability. That is clearly not the case this year because cost-of-living reductions are being proposed even though the Social Security Administration's actuaries project the system will maintain a $37 billion surplus through the end of this fiscal year.

If full cost-of-living adjustments are paid to beneficiaries as scheduled January 1, 1986, at a cost of $5.8 billion, the actuaries estimate the social security trust funds still will increase to $45 billion by the end of fiscal year 1986. Acting Social Security Commissioner Martha McSteen reaffirmed this fact in response to my questions during an appropriations subcommittee hearing last month.

Mrs. McSteen also clearly stated, and I quote, "that due to the dedicated contributions financing the payout * * * that whatever (the social security trust funds') expenditures are, and whatever the income is, does not affect the unified federal budget." To clarify this point, I asked her if the social security surplus could be used to fund national defense programs, build roads and bridges, provide for education or farm programs, or finance the interest on the national debt. In each case her answer was no.

It's wrong to suggest otherwise because the surplus cannot be used to reduce the budget deficit. For this reason, I have steadfastly opposed any attempts to eliminate or reduce the scheduled January 1, social security cost-of-living increase.

The budgetary choices Congress must face throughout this decade will only become more difficult, and as they do, the mounting social security surpluses will become more and more tempting. We cannot allow social security benefits to be chipped away year after year to provide false federal budgetary savings.

As the representative of more than 240,000 social security recipients in Pinellas County, Florida, it is my hope, Mr. Chairman, that your committee will affirm its support for full scheduled cost-of-living increases this year and that you will favorably consider my legislation to accelerate the separation of the social security trust funds from the general Treasury fund. Prompt action by Congress on this issue will return a sense of autonomy to the social security program and will reassure our nation's 36 million social security recipients that their benefits will no longer be in jeopardy year after year.●

IMPROVING OUR MEDICAL DEVICES LAW

HON. EDWARD R. MADIGAN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. MADIGAN. Mr. Speaker, today I am joined by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BROYHILL] in introducing the Food, Drug and Device Amendments of 1985. This bill responds to a request by the administration to amend the medical device provisions of the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetics Act [the Act] to make those provisions more effective.

Under present law, devices classified as "class I" are subject only to general controls under the act, while the Secretary of Health and Human Services is required to establish performance standards for all devices in class II.

Under this proposal, present classes I and II would be combined in a new class I category, and the Secretary would be authorized, but not required, to establish a performance standard for any device upon a finding that such a standard was necessary to provide reasonable assurance of safety or effectiveness. The bill would also streamline the procedure for establishing performance standards.

These amendments to the medical device law address the difficulties the Food and Drug Administration has faced in efforts to administer these provisions. Issuance and enforcement of mandatory performance standards for each of the 1,100 devices presently classified or proposed for classification in class II is not necessary to protect the public health and safety. For many of these devices, the general controls under the act and the adoption of voluntary standards by industry have proved to be sufficient. In those cases where establishment of a Federal performance standard is desirable, the present cumbersome statutory procedure is extremely time consuming and wasteful of administrative resources. For these reasons, we strongly urge adoption of these proposed amendments.

The bill would also enact various other amendments intended to improve the Department's ability to administer the act and would reduce administrative burdens both for the Department and for regulated firms without compromising the protection of the public health. The bill would enable the Secretary to obtain injunctions against the manufacture and distribution of counterfeit drugs; would repeal the requirement that the Department certify batches of antibiotic drugs upon request by the manufacturer; would repeal reporting requirements concerning electronic product radiation; and would repeal the obsolete Filled Milk Act.

We urge our colleagues to give this largely technical bill their prompt and favorable consideration. We are advised by the Office of Management and Budget that enactment of this bill would be in accord with the President's economic program.

The provisions of the bill are discussed in more detail in the section-by-section summary which follows:

FOOD, DRUG, AND DEVICE AMENDMENTS OF 1985 SECTION-BY-SECTION SUMMARY

SHORT TITLE

Section 1 would provide the short title of the bill. When enacted, it would be cited as the "Food, Drug, and Device Amendments of 1985".

AMENDMENT TO COMBINE CLASS I AND CLASS II MEDICAL DEVICES INTO A SINGLE CLASS I

Section 2 of the bill would combine into a single class I the medical devices currently in class I (for which general controls under the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act (FFD&C Act) are sufficient to provide reasonable assurance of safety and effectiveness) and class II (for which performance standards are required). Current class III (devices for which premarket approval is required) would be redesignated class II.

REVISION OF PROCEDURES FOR ESTABLISHING MEDICAL DEVICE PERFORMANCE STANDARDS

Section 3 of the bill would authorize the Secretary to establish a performance standard for any medical device, regardless of its classification, if she finds that such a standard is necessary to provide reasonable assurance of the safety or effectiveness of the device with respect to one or more aspects of the performance of the device. Under present law, the Secretary may establish performance standards only for class II devices.

This section would also repeal the present statutory procedures under the FFD&C Act for developing and establishing performance standards for medical devices, and would substitute a procedure similar to the one presently in use for prescribing performance standards for radiation-emitting electronic products under section 358 of the Public Health Service Act. Under this revised procedure, the Secretary would set standards by informal notice-and-comment rulemaking under the Administrative Procedure Act, in consultation with an appropriate advisory committee.

AUTHORITY TO ENJOIN PROHIBITED ACTS INVOLVING COUNTERFEIT DRUGS

Section 4 of the bill would eliminate the provision of the FFD&C Act which bars the Secretary from obtaining injunctions against the manufacture and distribution of counterfeit drugs and the making, selling, or concealing of the equipment used to make counterfeit drugs.

REPEAL OF REQUIREMENT TO CERTIFY BATCHES OF ANTIBIOTIC DRUGS UPON REQUEST BY MANUFACTURER

Section 5 of the bill would repeal a provision of the FFD&C Act which requires the Secretary, upon request by a manufacturer, to certify batches of antibiotics for conformity to applicable standards of identity, strength, quality, and purity. This provision, which has never been used, is included under the requirement that the Secretary certify each batch of antibiotics unless she has specifically exempted the antibiotic from this requirement.

Because of improvements in manufacturing, it has been determined that batch certification of antibiotics is no longer necessary to protect the public health, and the Department has, through regulations, exempted all antibiotics from batch certification requirements. (Batch certification could be reinstated temporarily where needed.) The remaining requirement for certification of batches of antibiotics upon demand by manufacturers is not necessary to protect the public health, and would be repealed by this proposed amendment.

REPEAL OF ELECTRONIC RADIATION REPORT REQUIREMENTS

Section 6(a) of the bill would repeal the requirement in the Public Health Service Act that the Secretary periodically study and report to the Congress on State and Federal control of health hazards from electronic product radiation, standards for the use of nonmedical electronic products, and procedures for the detection and measurement of electronic product radiation. This information would continue to be supplied to the Congress upon request and, as appropriate, in the FDA annual report.

Subsection (b) would repeal the requirement that the Secretary annually submit to the President for submission to the Congress a report on the administration of the electronic product radiation control program. This information would continue to be supplied to the Congress upon specific request and, as appropriate, in the FDA annual report.

REPEAL OF THE FILLED MILK ACT

Section 7 of the bill would repeal the Filled Milk Act. The Act, which bars interstate shipment of milk, cream, or skimmed milk which has any added fat or oil other than milk fat, was declared unconstitutional in 1972 and is not enforced.●

CONTADORAN PROCESS ESSENTIAL FOR PEACE IN NICARAGUA

HON. MIKE SYNAR

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. SYNAR. Mr. Speaker, I support the bipartisan proposal put forward by Mr. BARNES. I believe this approach is a much better means of achieving peace in Nicaragua than our past policy of military aid to the Contras.

We have a vested interest in Nicaragua because of its importance in Central America and its nearness to our country, and I have no intention of letting it become a Cuban-Soviet satellite. Right now, however, I believe our best hope of ending the conflict is bilateral talks that bring the two sides together for a negotiated peace through the Contadora process.

The CIA has spent $70 to $100 million on aid to the Contras. Rather than encouraging the Sandinistas to establish a democracy, this aid has actually given the Sandinistas an excuse to restrict individual freedoms. The Sandinistas view the terrorist activities of the Contras as a threat to the current government, and react accordingly. Continued military aid from the United States is certainly not going to induce the Sandinistas into loosening individual freedoms. If history is any teacher, the opposite will happen.

The administration has resorted to emotional appeals for military aid by referring to the Contras as "our brothers" and "just like our Founding Fathers." These characterizations are offensive. Neutral observers have documented numerous cases where Contra terrorists have kidnaped, tortured, and murdered innocent civilians, many of them women and children. Just recently, Contra forces massacred a wedding party in Nicaragua made up entirely of unarmed civilians, most of whom were women.

The administration argues that we should aid the Contras to prevent a Sandinistas military buildup and guarantee that they do not export their revolution. I believe both of these concerns are seriously overstated. First, attacks by the Contras give the Sandinistas an excuse to expand their military forces. It is illogical to assume that they will reduce their arms expenditures in the face of large guerrilla attacks. Second, the administration has failed to provide credible evidence that the Sandinistas are promoting foreign revolutions. In fact, the conservative Wall Street Journal recently wrote that Nicaragua "does not seem to be 'eager puppets' of Moscow or a serious military threat to neighboring countries, as President Reagan claims."

The admininistration claims to support negotiations between the Sandinistas and the Contras, but has so far focused its efforts exclusively on military support for the Contras. If the administration were seeking a peaceful settlement of its differences with Nicaragua, it would be supporting the efforts of the Contadora group—Mexico, Venezuela, Panama, and Colombia—which had produced several draft treaties on ending the conflict in Central America. If there are defects in these drafts, the administration should be negotiating to improve them, rather than seeking more funds for the Contras.

The Barnes proposal provides for the necessary U.S. support for the Contadora process. It provides $4 million for expenses arising from the implementation of a Contadora agreement, such as expenses for peacekeeping, verification, and monitoring systems.

The proposal also provides $10 million for humanitarian assistance for refugees who are outside of Nicaragua, regardless of whether they are associated with the Contras. This assistance is necessary to aid those civilians who have been forced to relocate due to conflict between government and Contra forces.

Finally, the proposal calls for continued congressional monitoring of Nicaragua's foreign and domestic policies in the areas of individual and press freedoms, dominance of the Sandinistas party, Soviet/Cuban ties and the military buildup, and efforts to export Sandinista influence and ideology. These are vital issues that are certain to determine whether future military aid is approved.

I have always believed that the United States should work toward a negotiated peace through the Contadora process. We will not achieve a peaceful settlement in Nicaragua by holding a gun to their head. The Barnes proposal provides the necessary incentives for future negotiations, while ensuring that Congress can act quickly if Nicaragua becomes a military threat to its neighbors.●

TAX EQUITY TO LEGAL GAMING INDUSTRY

HON. BARBARA F. VUCANOVICH

OF NEVADA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mrs. VUCANOVICH. Mr. Speaker, my distinguished colleague, Mr. REID, and I have introduced legislations, H.R. 2139 and H.R. 2138, to bring equity to the tax treatment of patrons of the legal gaming industry.

The first is a measure to exclude legal gaming payouts from gross income. The United States is the only country which taxes payouts from legal wagering as income. Foreign officials have prudently deemed such taxation of minimal gain, particularly at the cost of stimulating illegal operations. In short, taxation of legal winnings creates an advantage for the illegal operator, and thus serves only as a detriment to legal revenue efforts.

H.R. 2138, an alternative reform to H.R. 2139, simplifies IRS treatment of certain gaming winnings and corrects inequities regarding carryover of losses. This legislation enjoys a broad base of support, reaching far beyond patrons of the legal casino establishments in my State to those of parimutuel racing in 30 States, and of the State lotteries operating in 22 States and jurisdictions.

Both of these measures address erroneous Federal policy in a legitimate industry.

Mr. Speaker, at a time when individual States are assuming more responsibility for providing services to their citizens, I find it disturbing that the Federal Government continues to impede their efforts by encouraging illegal gambling outside the economy, further depriving them of scarce revenue dollars. The individual States authorize and oversee legal gaming operations in order to reduce the burden on their taxpayers. Federal tax policy in this area is regressive.

It should be noted that all of these changes were strongly endorsed by the Federal Commission on the Review of the National Policy Toward Gambling in 1976. Their final report concluded that withholding generates nominal revenues to the Federal Government, while encouraging the estimated $12 to $15 billion per year illegally wagered.

In most States, gaming is a legitimate form of revenue. This legislation would significantly increase State gambling revenues and reduce illegal gambling without adversely affecting Federal tax collection. These measures provide a crucial step in efforts to thwart illegal gaming operations and bolster State revenue goals.

I hope my colleagues will support these efforts to rectify tax treatment of law-abiding citizens who patronize legal gaming operations. Equity in this area is long overdue. I urge prompt and thorough consideration of these measures.●

THE NEED FOR EQUITY IN IRS DEFICIENCY ACTIONS

HON. JOHN F. SEIBERLING

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, the legacy of the extraordinary complexity of the U.S. Tax Code is an increasing inability by ordinary taxpayers to file their income taxes without unintentionally running afoul of the Internal Revenue Service.

Every tax season, my staff deals with a growing number of bewildered, frightened, and angry constituents who find themselves in the unfortunate position of owing the Government money because they didn't understand their taxes. The result is an erosion of confidence in the Government and, in my judgment, reduced compliance with the tax laws.

Taxpayer deficiencies are bad enough. But the situation is needlessly exacerbated by the IRS' inability to exercise a little compassion and discretion when dunning taxpayers for their mistakes. A constituent of mine recently wrote to appeal for help with her tax problems. Because of apparent tax preparation mistakes beyond her control, my constituent was dunned by the IRS in 1981, 1982, and 1984, the latter when a 1981 tax deduction was disallowed by the IRS, nearly 3 years after her tax return was filed. My constituent is an elderly widow now living on $500 a month, who finds herself owing the IRS $400 because of unintended mistakes on her tax return.

My constituent's deficiency problems are bad enough. But to add insult to injury, she actually overpaid her income taxes in 1979. One might think my constituent would be allowed to credit her overpayment against her deficiencies, but because of the 3-year statute of limitations on amending tax returns, she is completely unable to get any credit for her overpaid taxes. So, the IRS is making sure she pays fully for her deficiencies. But the Federal Government also keeps her earlier overpayment because the statute of limitations allowing her to claim the overpayment has expired.

This is absurd and it is unjust. The IRS is right to follow the letter of the law in tax dealings, but there are times when the spirit of the law and the principle of basic equity must also be allowed to be brought into play.

With that in mind, I am today introducing legislation which will give the IRS Commissioner the discretionary authority to waive the statute of limitations for the purpose of carrying forward taxpayer overpayments as a credit against subsequent deficiencies, where equity demands that such action be permitted. Only the principal amount of the overpayment—no interest—may be carried forward, and the decision to do so is discretionary, so the IRS will be free to deny the carryforward in cases which do not merit such action, such as, for example, an instance in which a taxpayer deliberately enters into a deficiency in order to claim a longstanding overpayment. The overpayment may be carried forward only as a credit against deficiencies, so the Government cannot and will not reimburse a taxpayer for a prior overpayment.

Mr. Speaker, enactment of my bill would at least give the IRS the authority to deal with problems such as that of my constituent with a little more leeway, hopefully eliminating this woeful inequity in taxpayer treatment.●

JERSEY CITY'S ST. PAUL'S CHURCH IN BERGEN (EPISCOPAL) CELEBRATES ITS 125TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. FRANK J. GUARINI

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. GUARINI. Mr. Speaker, this year St. Paul's Church in Bergen (Episcopal) is celebrating its 125th anniversary on Sunday, April 28, 1985, at 4 o'clock in the afternoon when a Festival Eucharist Service will be held with all former parishioners and friends invited to attend.

The church has been located on its present site at 38 Duncan Avenue, Jersey City, since May 21, 1861, but its name derives from its location in the town of Bergen, which was the first permanent settlement in New Jersey, founded in 1660 by a group of Dutch burghers from New Amsterdam.

Bergen figured in the American Revolution in 1776, when for 1 month it was the headquarters of the American Army, which surprised the British forces at the Battle of Paulus Hook and captured the British fort.

At the services on Sunday, Bishop Jose Gonzales, D.D., retired bishop of Cuba, will be the celebrant and the Right Reverend Leland Stark, D.D., will preach the sermon.

Mr. James Adler, organist and music director of Saint Paul's Church, will introduce a festive choral amen for chorus and organ, which will receive its premiere on this occasion. The choir of St. Paul's Church will be joined by the choir of St. Aloysius Roman Catholic Church on this occasion.

I was pleased to send my message of good will, along with greetings from the Right Reverend Paul Moore, Episcopal bishop of New York; the Right Reverend John Shelby Spong, Episcopal Bishop of Newark, NJ; Most Reverend Jerome Pechillo, Episcopal vicar of the Archdiocese of Newark, Senator BILL BRADLEY, Democrat of New Jersey; Senator Frank LAUTENBERG, Democrat of New Jersey; the Honorable Gerald McCann, mayor of Jersey City; and the Berkeley Divinity School of Yale University.

The Reverend Francis W. Carr, a native of Boston, MA, became the 10th rector of St. Paul's Church in 1969. During his rectorship he has developed ecumenical relations in the community. The enhancement of the value of the property has been greatly improved under his rectorship. He has served 15 years on the board of trustees of Christ Hospital. Various other boards on which he has served are: Red Cross, Young Men's Christian Association, Christ Hospital Community Mental Health, and Let's Celebrate, a church-sponsored organization that feeds the hungry.

During the past 14 years, there has been a summer program for neighborhood children. Services have been extended to many community groups, such as the Duncan Avenue Neighborhood Association, Cub Scouts, Alcoholics Anonymous, Jersey City Preservation and Restoration Association, and tenant associations. The 100th anniversary of Christ Hospital Service of Thanksgiving was held at the church in 1973 with Presiding Bishop Hines in attendance.

With the ever-changing population in the city, the Reverend Francis W. Carr has extended and encouraged the fellowship of worship to all who desire to participate in the services.

The archives of the church reflect the following history:

1860-86.—Until 1860, there was no Protestant Episcopal Church in the township of Bergen. The nearest were Holy Trinity in Hudson City, of which the Reverend L.L. Nobel was rector, and Christ Church at Claremont under the rectorship of the Reverend O. Harriman. The need for a church became more apparent for the residents in Bergen, and a group of individuals began holding services in a small school house on Gardner Avenue in Jersey City. The property was owned by Mr. E.B. Wakeman. The group grew, and in August 1860, the Right Reverend W.H. Odenheimer, bishop of New Jersey, gave permission to organize a new parish in the town of Bergen. Two wardens and eight vestrymen were elected and the Reverend Fernando C. Putnam was chosen as the first rector of the new parish. The incorporation of Saint Paul's Church in Bergen (Episcopal) was on December 28, 1860, in Jersey City, NJ.

The Reverend Fernando C. Putnam served as rector of the church from 1860 to 1886. Under his supervision, the property on which the church stands was purchased in 1861. During this period, a building fund was established to acquire more land. Mr. Putnam died on October 27, 1886, and the vestry selected a new rector.

1887-1918.—The Reverend William Peck Bush of Northampton, MA, became rector of Saint Paul's Church in 1887. The original edifice was completely renovated under his rectorship, and the parish house and Sunday school room were rebuilt through the generosity of the Women's Auxiliary Missionary Society. The Evening Journal of April 21, 1889, described the building as one of the most beautiful churches in the city. Saint Paul's grew during this period. Mr. Brush became ill and was appointed by the vestry as rector emeritus with a yearly stipend for the rest of his life. He died on November 21, 1919.

1916-17.—The Reverend A. Glover Dunseath was the next rector and he came from St. George's Church in New York City. His rectorship was of short duration, for he left early in the war to become an army chaplain.

1917-21.—The Reverend Joseph Russell Lynes, from Great Barrington, MA, accepted the call to become the new rector of Saint Paul's Church in Bergen. During his rectorship, the church progressed, and Gov. Edward I. Edwards, a vestryman of Saint Paul's Church, unveiled in January 1921 a service flag, dedicated to the many young men of the parish who served in World War I. Dr. Lynes, during his rectorship, was awarded an honorary doctorate by Lafayette College. He resigned in December 1921 to become rector of Saint Paul's Church in Englewood, NJ, where he remained until his death in 1932.

1922-37.—The Reverend Edgar L. Cook had been a chaplain during the first World War. During his 15 years at Saint Paul's Church, the city changed greatly and the church grew. In May 1937 he resigned to become rector of Christ Church in Hackensack, NJ, where he remained until his death in 1942.

1937-46.—The Reverend John L. Ledger came from Ellensburg, WA, and became rector of Saint Paul's Church in 1937. During this period, the activities of the church multiplied. He was appointed archdeacon of Hudson County. He resigned to accept a call in 1946 to Reno, NV. During World War II and the Korean conflict, the young men of St. Paul's served their country in various parts of the world. Three of them, Robert Berkhofer, Oliver Jones, and William Worfolk, lost their lives in the performance of their duties and are represented by gold stars on St. Paul's Roll of Honor.

The Reverend Leon H. Plante came from Fitchburg, MA. Under his leadership, there was an increase in youth activities. He was responsible for what is known as the every member canvass. In 1949, he resigned to accept a call in Hawthorne, NJ. During his rectorship, the church was in sound financial condition, and a marked increase in the number of communicants occurred.

1950-66.—The Reverend Francis Slade Danzoll became the eighth rector of Saint Paul's Church in January 1950. He had served as executive assistant at Grace Church in New York City. The year of 1950 saw many changes at Saint Paul's Church. He reorganized the church school and supervised repairs and improvements which were begun on the church property. He was appointed as archdeacon of the Hudson Convocation and president of the Christ Hospital Board of Trustees and established the endowment fund for the church. Financial growth was marked during this period, and during the first year he inaugurated a Christmas service called "A Festival of Nine Lessons and Carols." Framed from ancient precedent, the nine lessons tell the story of redemption as portrayed in Holy Scriptures. This event has become an annual service.

1966-69.—The Reverend Frederick Ward Kates served during this period as rector of Saint Paul's Church. He is a gifted writer and author and has written many devotional books. He enhanced the value of the property, and the driveway was extended to park 14 cars.

Saint Paul's Church, with its dignity and community service, has meant so much to Jersey City. It is a delight to witness the devoted parishioners visiting the church on Sunday. It reminds me so much of the words of Henry Ward Beecher, who said:

A world without a Sabbath would be like a man without a smile, like a summer without flowers, and like a homestead without a garden. It is the joyous day of the whole week.

I believe this church deserves a special tribute for promoting the spirit of ecumenism and teaching the brotherhood of man,

Let us walk joyfully answering to that of God in every man.

Their interaction in the community echoes the words of His Excellence, Pope John Paul II when speaking at an ecumenical meeting at Trinity College when he visited America during October 1979, where he said:

I have endeavored to devote myself to the service of Christian unity; for, as I stated in my first Encyclical, it is certain that in the present historical situation of Christianity and of the world the only possibility we see in fulfilling the Church's universal mission, with regard to ecumenical questions, is that of seeking sincerely, perseveringly, humbly and also courageously, the ways of drawing closer and of union (Redemptor Hominus, 6).

I am certain that all of my colleagues here in the House of Representatives wish to join me with a prayer for the continued service from this dedicated parish and a salute for its 125 years of service to God and man.●

PAUL GONZALEZ HONORED

HON. ROBERT GARCIA

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, today we acknowledge the extensive talents of Cliff Gonzalez, a young man whose ability, determination, and willpower provides inspiration to his generation and ours.

Cliff is a senior student-athlete at St. Raymond High School in the Bronx. Cliff's physical talents are displayed most vividly on the baseball field, where his accomplishments earned him distinction as the New York Post's High School athlete of the week. However, Cliff's accomplishments are not limited to the ballfield. Cliff Gonzalez has close to a 90 average and also has a strong desire to attain a college education before fulfilling his dream of a professional baseball career. In these ways, Cliff Gonzalez has earned our respect and our admiration.

I would like to extend my best wishes to Cliff Gonzalez in his future endeavors. For as the following article accurately denotes, Cliff's enormous talents will not end with high school.

[From the New York Post, Apr. 10, 1985]

POST HS ATHLETE OF WEEK

CLIFF GONZALEZ, ST. RAYMOND

(By Steve Barenfeld)

Cliff Gonzalez can do it all—and last week he did.

Gonzalez, a senior centerfielder for St. Raymond HS in The Bronx, went 10-for-16 with two home runs, three doubles and seven RBIs to lead the Ravens to five victories.

For his outstanding performance, Gonzalez is The Post's High School Athlete of the Week.

Gonzalez, 5-10, 155-pounds, started poorly last week. Batting third, he went 0-for-2 in a 3-2 win over Lehman on Tuesday. On Wednesday, the lefthanded-hitter, who throws righty, went 2-for-3 and drove in a run in St. Ray's 14-0 rout of St. Francis Prep. The next day he again was 2-for-3 with a double and an RBI in a 3-2 victory over George Washington.

But it was Saturday when Gonzalez really started banging the ball. He went 3-for-3 with a homer, two doubles and an RBI in the morning when St. Ray's beat McClancy. Later in the day, in the Monroe Tournament, he went 3-for-5 with another home run and stole his 100th career base in a 27-0 stroll past Norman Thomas.

He doesn't plan on letting up, either.

"I think I can keep up this pace," said Gonzalez, who will be 18 next Thursday. "This is my last year and I want to leave with a bang."

There's no reason why he can't. Gonzalez, who hit .454 last season, is a marvelous athlete who already was considered major league material. But he has gotten better.

"I know I've improved tremendously," Gonzalez said. "This past winter I worked on Nautilus and improved my strength. I'm also smarter and more selective at the plate."

"He's the best player I've ever had," said Raven coach Ron Patnosh, who is in his 18th year. "He does everything. He can run—he goes from home to first in 3.8. He hits for power and average. He has a major-league arm."

"I think he has a good shot to get drafted."

So does Gonzalez, but that doesn't mean he'll go right for a pro career.

"If the money's right—over $40,000—I would sign," he said.

"But if not, I'll go to college."

Seton Hall, St. John's, Oklahoma State and Old Dominion have offered him full scholarships. But Gonzalez, who has close to a 90 average, would like to go to Yale.

"I'd like to be a business person," he said. "I know they have an average baseball program, but I don't think where you play in college makes that much of a difference. You really develop in summer leagues.

"I've always loved baseball, and my friends get mad at me because I'm always either playing or watching on TV. I'd love to play major league ball and I feel I have a very good shot."●

CALL TO MEMBERS OF CONGRESS BY NOBEL LAUREATES

HON. PATRICIA SCHROEDER

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to bring to the attention of my colleagues the letter from over half the living Nobel Laureates in the United States who oppose U.S. military action or aid against Nicaragua. A copy of the letter was delivered to each of our offices last week. I submit it here for the record and ask each of you to keep it in mind as we consider funds for the Contras.

CALL TO MEMBERS OF CONGRESS BY NOBEL LAUREATES ON THE QUESTION OF U.S. COVERT AID FOR USE AGAINST NICARAGUA

We, the undersigned Nobel Laureates, are opposed to any military action, overt or covert, by the United States government against the Republic of Nicaragua. Aggression against Nicaragua constitutes a violation of that country's territorial integrity and national sovereignty, a violation of treaties already approved by the U.S. Congress and sanctioned by international law, as well as a violation of the Charter of the United Nations.

We call upon the Congress to refuse its consent to any request by the Reagan Administration for funds, troops, training or materiel to be used either by the armed forces of the United States directly or by the "contras" or other forces in attacks upon the people and government of Nicaragua; and we call upon the Congress to urge negotiations with Nicaragua in order to improve the relations between the two countries.

We further call upon the Congress to stop the increasing militarization of Central America by the Reagan Administration.

BOAT PEOPLE RISK THEIR LIVES TO FLEE TO FREEDOM, THAI FISHERMEN AID MANY

HON. STEPHEN J. SOLARZ

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. SOLARZ. Mr. Speaker, over 280 Indochinese refugees, who sought to escape persecution and repression in their homelands by taking to the sea in small boats, lost their lives last year due to drowning, murder, and abductions at sea by pirates.

Recently, the New York Times published an article by Ms. Barbara Crosette on the continuing saga of the Indochinese boat people and the conditions under which they live in refugee camps in South East Asia. Because of the importance of this story, I ask, Mr. Speaker, that Ms. Crosette's article be reprinted in today's CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

VIETNAMESE BOAT PEOPLE: A 10-YEAR, ONE-WAY TIDE

(By Barbara Crossette)

SONGKHLA, THAILAND.—In Hanoi and Ho Chi Minh City, the Vietnamese are preparing to celebrate the 10th anniversary of North Vietnam's conquest of the South. In towns and cities across the United States, veterans and scholars of the war are sitting back and analyzing a traumatic era.

But here on a beach in southern Thailand, Mai Xuan Sang has neither cause for celebration nor time for reflection. A few weeks ago Mr. Sang, a 40-year-old electrician, put his wife, two children, a sister and a brother-in-law in a 25-foot (10-meter) boat, turned his back on Vietnam and pushed out into a perilous sea.

"In Saigon," he said, using Ho Chi Minh City's old name, "I had no job, no money. I could not buy rice. We could not continue." "Twenty hours into his voyage, Mr. Sang said, the boat's motor stopped. He says he had to row for two days before being rescued by a Thai trawler. He considers himself lucky. Despite a sharp reduction last year in piracy, "seven out of 10 boats are still attacked," Mr. Sang said.

Ten years after the end of the Vietnam War, the "boat people" are still coming to Thailand. About 1,500 a month flee Vietnam by sea, according to UN figures. Another 2,000 leave monthly by air as legal emigrants under the Orderly Departure Program. Hundreds try to escape overland across Cambodia to Thailand.

Those who come by boat, like Mr. Sang and others passing through the reception center outside Songkhla on the Gulf of Siam, are no longer the rich and well-connected. In the small crowd that gathered around Mr. Sang one recent afternoon to hear him tell his story, there were fishermen, farmers, a teacher, shopkeepers and a goldsmith.

Many of them had little formal education; few spoke even rudimentary French or English. Almost none had guarantees of Western sponsorship. They were profiles, in short, of refugees who will be the hardest of all to place, relief workers say.

Yet nearly all of them have high hopes of a new life in the United States because of past associations with Americans who had left their lives as suddenly as they had entered, but who have never ceased to be thought of as potential saviors.

In the Songkhla camp, where the most recent arrivals from the Gulf of Siam are housed temporarily, family after family besieged a visitor with scraps of paper bearing the names of Americans they had once known, people they were sure would help them, even after all these years, if only they could be found:

"Colonel Shipman—be advised the Seventh Division," A Vietnamese veteran called out.

"MacPherson—can you find MacPherson who was in Ba Ang?" an old man asked.

"My godfather's name was Craig Wilson," a teen-ager said. "I think he is in California."

Sometimes they pressed party decipherable addresses into a visitor's hands.

After initial processing and medical care, the boat refugees, including increasing numbers who flee to the Union Oil Co. rigs in the Gulf and are brought ashore by UN-chartered vessels, move on from Songkhla to a camp in central Thailand to await resettlement. There, refugee workers help them trace relatives and friends abroad.

The accounts by newly arrived boat people suggest that many are leaving Vietnam after having served up to nine years in the prisons that Hanoi originally called "re-education camps." Most of the people say they were arrested because of their association with Americans or with the U.S.-supported South Vietnamese Army or government.

The United States last year offered to accept all re-education camp inmates who met immigration requirements. But Vietnam has not agreed to release them, saying it fears the exiles will form a dangerous source of opposition outside the country.

Bui Van Huot, 35, who fled Vietnam in January with his wife and four young children, was a cadet in the South Vietnamese military academy when U.S. troops left in 1973. He was rounded up in 1975 and imprisoned briefly. After being released, he said, he immediately began to plot an escape, while going to work as a farmer. It took him until 1985 to find a way out of the country.

Past refugees said a fee of several ounces of gold or the equivalent of several hundred dollars a person was commonly paid to secure a place on a boat. Refugees said the money often went to the local Vietnamese authorities, who sometimes provided the vessel.

Here at Songkhla, several refugees said they had paid very little or nothing for their passages, using instead the boats of friends who also wanted to escape. Their apparent poverty, however, did not prevent attacks by fishermen-pirates on the high seas.

Ho Le Thuy, a 43-year-old woman who fled Vietnam last August with her husband, a former South Vietnamese army officer, and six children, said their small craft carrying 13 persons was attacked three times in three days. Their last attackers, finding no valuables, abducted Mrs. Thuy and her three daughters, who were sexually abused until rescued by another Thai craft 14 days later.

Mrs. Thuy's attackers have been caught, however, and have gone on trial in Songkhla, in a case that UN officials say reflects a radical change in Thai attitudes toward piracy over the last 15 to 18 months.

Equipped with three navy patrol craft, three planes and seven police boats, a Thai antipiracy operation based in Songkhla, and supported by a consortium of donor countries, including the United States, is reducing substantially the number of pirate attacks in Thai waters, refugee officials say.

Vietnamese also are attacked and robbed by fishing boats of other nations, including their own, Thai officials say.

"We can't guarantee that all our fishermen are not pirates," Captain Pravit Sivaraks said at the Songkhla Naval Station. "But we can say that all of the pirates are not Thai."

"The number of arrests, prosecutions and convictions of pirates in Thailand during 1984 marks a clear improvement in the fight against piracy," a report by the UN High Commissioner for Refugees in Geneva concluded last year.

The agency's statistics said that 35 percent of refugee boats in the area of Southeast Asia were attacked in 1984, down from 52 percent in 1983.

Thailand's increased attention to the piracy problem stems, Thai and international officials say, partly from a Thai Foreign Ministry concern about the country's image abroad, especially in the United Nations, where Thailand is now a member of the Security Council.

Thai and UN refugee officials would like to see Hanoi allow more Vietnamese to emigrate, and more accepted by Western nations, so that fewer would attempt the dangerous escape by sea.

Prasong Soonsiri, Thailand's National Security Council chief, who has partial responsibility for the hundreds of thousands of refugees on Thailand's four international borders and long seacoast, suggested recently that the refugee problem stemmed from Hanoi's inability, after 10 years of rule, to improve the lives of the Vietnamese people economically or politically.

"In Thailand, we vote with our hands," he said. "In Vietnam, they have to vote with their legs."●

IGNORING VIETNAM LESSONS WILL HURT IN CENTRAL AMERICA

HON. JOHN F. SEIBERLING

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, in connection with remarks I made today on "Aid to the Contras and the Lessons of Vietnam," I quoted from a recent article by James McCartney of Knight-Ridder Newspapers, printed in the Akron Beacon Journal of April 14, 1985. For the benefit of my colleagues, I am placing in the RECORD the full text of James McCartney's significant article following these remarks.

The article follows:

IGNORING VIETNAM LESSONS WILL HURT IN CENTRAL AMERICA

WASHINGTON.—It was 10 years ago this month that President Gerald Ford ignominiously ended the U.S. war in Vietnam, flashing the order to diplomats to board helicopters and flee the U.S. Embassy in Saigon.

But a great national debate continues over what lessons, if any, were learned in Vietnam. The lack of national consensus that marked the war itself continues to this day.

And that is too bad. For there were lessons to be learned from Vietnam—probably the most important political lessons of our time—and they have not been learned in many of the places where it counts most.

The political mindset that led the nation down the garden path into the war in Vietnam, where more than 55,000 Americans needlessly died, remains the mindset of many in positions of power to this day.

There are those who would do it all again if they had a chance. Only this time they might make even a worse botch of it.

One of the myths that has developed about Vietnam—encouraged by many on the far right—is that we might have won the war if we had gone all out, used all of our available power.

They still have not learned the central lesson of Vietnam. That lesson was that a great and powerful nation cannot necessarily solve political problems with raw military power.

We could not change the minds of the North Vietnamese by threats or with bombs. We could not prop up a phony, plastic regime in South Vietnam and make it last.

We put into Vietnam 550,000 of our best troops, backed by B-52s and our most sophisticated jet fighters, and could not win against a primitive nation that had no bombers and no air force.

We built up an army of a million South Vietnamese and convinced ourselves that it was a real army that could defend itself. And when that South Vietnam army got the mere ghost of a challenge after our withdrawal, it melted away like so much hot butter. The South Vietnamese army proved to be no stronger than the weak political base on which it was built.

The lesson of Vietnam was not that we didn't try hard enough. It was that we couldn't have won in that political situation no matter how hard we tried.

It is a lesson that we might well keep in mind in Central America. The lesson is that ultimately we are not going to win or lose in Central America with military power. We are going to win or lose on the basis of the economic and political strength of our allies.

Paradoxically, it was not the American military who made the mistakes in Vietnam, it was freely elected American political leaders.

But it is the military that has learned the lessons of Vietnam best.

They know that Vietnam was a mistake and a lost cause and it is they, along with a good many smart congressmen, who have been providing the brakes on further American military involvement in Central America.

The professional military learned that there are limits to what raw power can accomplish when there is no solid political base.

But there are many civilians in both the Pentagon and the State Department today who are too anxious to brandish military power.

Were it not for foot-dragging from the Pentagon, and in Congress, the Reagan administration at this point would probably have put a lot more U.S. military personnel in Central America than it has.

And pretty soon some would be killed, and more troops would be sent to protect them. And pretty soon you'd be on the road to another Vietnam.

But the point is that the nation is not out of these woods.

The Reagan administration is ambivalent about Central America and is not sure what it wants to do. One day it wants to brandish the sword and the next day it wants to emphasize peace talks.

As an administration, it is not sure what the lessons of Vietnam were. It is just as torn as the public at large.

For that reason it is well that we meditate upon Vietnam these 10 years later.

We should talk to those veterans who bore the burden. We should read those history books. We should try to understand as best we can why this great nation made so tragic a series of mistakes.

If we don't, we have no one to blame but ourselves if it all happens again.●

PENNSYLVANIA, SOUTH CAROLINA CASES HIGHLIGHT NEED FOR PLANT CLOSING BILL

HON. WILLIAM (BILL) CLAY

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. CLAY. Mr. Speaker, on March 20, 1985, I, along with Congressman WILLIAM D. FORD of Michigan and SILVIO O. CONTE of Massachusetts, introduced legislation on the national problem of plant closings. The bill, the Labor-Management Notification and Consultation Act of 1985, addresses the severe problems that arises when an employer contemplates closing a facility.

H.R. 1616 contains three main elements. First, it creates a blue ribbon commission to study every aspect of the plant closings issue and report its findings to Congress. Second, like plant closing legislation introduced in previous Congresses, the bill provides for a modest advance notice requirement of 90 days—surely the least workers and their communities should expect in any humane industrial framework so that they can plan for necessary adjustments.

The third feature of the bill and the one I want to highlight today is a new element in plant closing legislation: The duty of an employer to consult with employee representatives over the decision that will so drastically affect their lives, and to share information relevant to the closing decision. Such consultation and information will provide an opportunity for labor and management to seek alternatives to a plant closing. Consultation and information greatly increase the chances of avoiding the closing and saving jobs where that possibility exists. Consultation and information have the added benefit of keeping informed those who are most affected by a decision to close.

Mr. Speaker, the circumstances of two current plant closing situations that have been brought to my attention speak to the need for a consultation and information requirement in the bill. In both cases the employers have provided a 1-year—as opposed to H.R. 1616's 3-month—advance notice of closing, for which they should be commended. However the strenuous efforts of the employees to engage in meaningful consultation or to secure information over the decision to close has been largely futile.

BLACK & DECKER IN ALLENTOWN, PA

In Allentown, PA, Black & Decker Manufacturing Co. has announced plans to close its profitable housewares plant in early 1986. The proposed shutdown would put nearly 900 employees out of work in the economically hard-hit area of eastern Pennsylvania. Purchased by Black & Decker from General Electric in April 1984, the Allentown plant produces the popular line of GE toaster ovens and other housewares products. According to press reports, Black & Decker acknowledges that the plant is profitable and well-maintained.

Upon acquiring the Allentown plant in April 1984, Black & Decker reached a peaceful contract settlement with United Electrical Workers [UE] Local 128. According to documents published by Black & Decker, company officials asserted that "Allentown is Number One" in the new housewares division, and told union representatives that "Black & Decker looks forward to a relationship of mutual trust and respect" with the union. Six months later, without any discussion or consultation with affected employees or their union representatives, Black & Decker announced a decision to close the plant in early 1986 and shift Allentown work to other Black & Decker facilities. The Allentown plant is the only union-represented facility in all of Black & Decker's U.S. and Canadian plants.

Since that announcement the union has made repeated requests for comparative information on the plants to which Allentown's work will be moved, and for other information underlying management's decision to close the plant. The company refused to provide what it called proprietary information and refused to discuss the plant closing decision, calling it "the exclusive responsibility of management."

In response to the company's position, Black & Decker workers in Allentown have undertaken a protest campaign seeking support from trade unions, churches, civil rights, and community organizations, consumer groups and others to convince Black & Decker to reconsider the closing decision. Mr. Speaker, this unfortunate confrontation—sure to be repeated in future plant closing crises—could be avoided by the parties consulting with each other and exchanging needed information before a plant closing decision becomes a fait accompli. Such is the purpose of H.R. 1616.

GENERAL ELECTRIC IN CHARLESTON, SC

In Charleston, SC, General Electric Co. announced last June a decision to close its large steam turbine generator plant in June 1985, affecting 450 jobs. The Charleston plant is a modern, productive facility opened in 1968. At full capacity in the mid-1970's the plant employed 1,200 people in its large-scale metal fabricating and precision machining operations. In recent years, however, a downturn in the rate of growth in electric power demand has led to a cutback in orders for large steam turbine generator plants. The resulting fall in orders for Charleston GE products led to the plant closing decision.

Convinced that their skills and experience could profitably be used making metalworking systems for expanding rather than contracting markets, Charleston GE workers in UE Local 1202 formed an alternative use committee to develop an economic conversion proposal for the facility. The alternative use committee asked GE management to avoid a closing by converting the plant to production of environmental protection equipment such as acid rain scrubbers, acid rain-preventing high technology combustion systems or specialized tanks and containers for hazardous materials storage and transport, or production of alternative energy systems such as cogeneration units, solid waste burning generators or renewable energy systems for hydroelectric or geothermal power generation.

Charleston workers asked General Electric for information and input that would flesh out their economic conversion plan. They asked GE to bring in company specialists in these product areas to help refine the alternative use proposal. More recently, they asked GE to permit the alternative use committee to meet with the real estate agency seeking to sell the plant. In each instance GE rebuffed union's initiatives, citing its nonobligation to consult with the union over the plant closing. Thus, a modern, productive facility will now go into mothballs and 450 workers who could be applying their skills to much-needed environmental protection and alternative energy systems will be out of work.

Mr. Speaker, the consultation and information provisions of H.R. 1616 do not guarantee that a plant closing can be avoided. Perhaps even in the instances I have described the results would be the same. But H.R. 1616 goes far to guarantee that every possibility of avoiding a shutdown can be explored. Unfortunately, that opportunity has been denied to the workers in Allentown and Charleston.

Opposition to these sections of the bill can only be based on the premise that an all-powerful, all-knowing management is the only relevant force in the process of economic change, and that working people and their unions, having no initiatives or creative ideas of their own, must passively accept their fate as sacrifices on the altar of flexibility and management rights, grateful for severance pay or other plant closing benefits but mute on the prospects of saving their jobs. The House should reject this patronizing view. As the UE members in Allentown and Charleston have shown, workers and their unions have much to offer in the way of ideas, approaches, and alternatives to plant closings. H.R. 1616 provides for a peaceful search for alternatives to shut-downs, unemployment, and confrontation.●

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert my Washington report for Wednesday, April 24, 1985, into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

THE MX CONTROVERSY

Few weapons have generated as much controversy as the MX missile. Three administrations and several Congresses have struggled with the question of whether to build the MX. Congress recently debated whether to spend $1.5 billion to build an additional 21 missiles. The President lobbied hard, arguing that continued production of the MX is essential to national security and to the success of the Geneva arms control talks. Our chief negotiator, Ambassador Kampelman, returned from Geneva to persuade members to support the President's request. In the end, Congress narrowly agreed.

Many Hoosiers have asked me why I oppose the production of the MX missile. I have given them four primary reasons: it is a destabilizing weapon that significantly changes our basic strategic doctrine; there are better alternatives available; it is unlikely that the MX will become a bargaining chip because of the Administration's commitment to it; and its cost is excessive in our current fiscal crunch.

First, deployment of the MX is a major change in U.S. strategic doctrine, and is a destabilizing addition to our arsenal. The MX violates the fundamental U.S. strategic rule that the object of any new system is to deter; and to deter safely it must be able to survive. For 30 years, we have made it a standard that our nuclear weapons must be able to survive a first strike and then be able to fire back (the "survivable second-strike capability"). We should not now move to a non-survivable first-strike system. The Administration maintains that the U.S. is not seeking such a first-strike capability with the MX missile. However, some 75% of the Soviet nuclear force is land-based and more vulnerable to an MX-type system than the submarine—and air-launched missiles which comprise about 75% of the U.S. force. The Soviets can only conclude that a weapon as accurate and as vulnerable as the MX will be used as a first-strike weapon. Any suggestion that the U.S. may be moving toward a policy of striking first will only serve to move both superpowers into a more dangerous posture.

The MX adds little to U.S. retaliatory capability. No survivable basing mode has been developed for the MX system. If it is deployed as planned in Minuteman silos, which have been targeted by the Soviets for 20 years, it will be extremely vulnerable. Only a major, unanticipated technological breakthrough would improve significantly the survivability of the MX. The missiles' vulnerability might force the President to consider launching them at the first warning of an attack. This "use it or lose it" system increases the chances of an accidental war and limits the President's flexibility in a crisis.

Second, there are better alternatives to the MX. More mobile, single-warhead missiles like the "Midgetman" missile now being developed offer a more effective and survivable land-based deterrent for the future. Until the "Midgetman" is deployed, missiles on Trident submarines, retrofitted Minuteman III missiles, strategic bombers, and ground- and air-launched cruise missiles will provide sufficient accuracy and power for effective deterrence and arms control bargaining leverage. The U.S. must maintain a well-balanced, modern traid of nuclear weapons that makes it impossible for the Soviet Union to destroy all U.S. weapons in a single strike. Adding vulnerable MX missiles to our arsenal does not improve deterrence or strengthen our retaliatory capabilities.

Third, I am not persuaded that the MX will be an effective bargaining chip. Our experience has taught us that a bargaining chip works best when one side threatens to develop or deploy a new weapon. Once a weapon is actually deployed, however, it acquires powerful supporters and a momentum of its own that is difficult to reverse. It also triggers new Soviet programs. With billions of dollars already invested in MX deployment, it is unlikely that the Administration will simply give it up. Moreover, the President has said several times that the MX is not negotiable, and I take him at his word.

Congress has now approved funding for 42 MX missiles. Last year, the President argued that we needed the MX to bring the Soviets back to the negotiating table. This year, he argued that the arms talks would collapse unless Congress approved more MX missiles. But the Soviets walked out of arms control talks in 1983 despite congressional approval of 21 MX missiles. Since the Administration eventually hopes to deploy 100 MX missiles in superhardened silos and to develop an additional 123 missiles for testing purposes, the argument over the relationship of arms control and the MX could continue indefinitely. It is my impression that rather than using the MX as a bargaining chip with the Soviets, the President is using arms control as a bargain chip with Congress to win continued approval of the MX.

Fourth, given the instability and vulnerability of the MX systems, and the better alternatives that are available, it does not seem wise to continue funding a program that is expected to cost $40 billion. The U.S. can no longer buy every weapons system that the Pentagon wants. Each has some advantages, but the nation faces a serious fiscal problem, and weapons systems that offer only marginal improvements in U.S. security must be abandoned. Elimination of the MX system would make an important contribution toward our deficit-cutting efforts.

At the same time, we need to re-evaluate our priorities in defense spending. In recent years, our largest increases have gone for strategic weapons. We now rely heavily on nuclear weapons to deter a non-nuclear attack, but such reliance increases the risk of nuclear war. If we hope to avoid nuclear war, we should use more of our defense dollars to improve conventional forces.

Although MX opponents lost this round, the missiles' future remains uncertain. The President requested $3.2 billion in 1986 to produce another 48 MX missiles, but a Senate committee cut that request to 21. My guess is that the President will not get all the missiles he is requesting.●

JEWS PRESSURED ON ISSUE OF ARMENIAN GENOCIDE

HON. TONY COELHO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. COELHO. Mr. Speaker, I thought that my colleagues would find interesting the following Los Angeles Times article concerning the pressure being applied on Jewish leaders by the Turkish lobby to discourage them from recognizing the Armenian genocide. I feel it is a sad statement that the Turkish Government has gone so far as to force Jews to not become involved in the effort to recognize the tragedy which the Armenians suffered. It is one thing to deny the truth, but it is quite a different thing to force others to deny it as well.

The article follows:

[From the Los Angeles Times, Apr. 22, 1985]

TARGET OF TURKISH CAMPAIGN—JEWS PRESSURED ON ISSUE OF ARMENIAN GENOCIDE

(By Mark Arax)

As part of a campaign to deny that massacres of Armenians occurred 70 years ago in eastern Turkey, Turkish officials are quietly exerting pressure on local and national Jewish groups to discourage Jews from recognizing Armenians as fellow victims of genocide.

In recent months, Jewish leaders in Los Angeles and New York have received telephone calls from the Turkish ambassador in Washington and cables from Turkish Jews in Istanbul urging them to cancel scheduled presentations by Armenian-American speakers on the 1915 genocide.

According to local Jewish leaders, Turkish representatives implied that if the Jewish-sponsored speeches went ahead in Los Angeles, they could imperil the well-being of Turkish Jews and might prompt the closing of a border crossing in Turkey that has been an avenue of escape for Jews fleeing Iran.

In one instance, the Jewish Federation Council of Greater Los Angeles received a cable from the chief rabbi in Istanbul objecting to the group's sponsorship of a speech by Richard Hovannisian, an Armenian history professor at UCLA. Murray Wood, an executive director of the federation, said objections to the speech last November also were raised in calls from Turkish Ambassador Sukru Elekdag to the World Jewish Congress in New York.

"Here we are halfway around the world, and they are telling us we are doing something that will be detrimental to the Jewish community there," Wood said. "It was disturbing and frustrating. At one point, I was told the border was closed for 6 to 12 hours and several people were turned away, all because the speech went forward. I later found out that wasn't true."

"The threats were never expressly stated but the implication in the phone calls and cables was very clear. I can put two and two together."

In another instance, Jewish leaders in Turkey telephoned New York officials at the Anti-Defamation League objecting to a talk last December in Los Angeles by Armand Arabian, an associate justice of the Court of Appeal. Local league officials refused to cancel the talk, and Arabian gave a moving account before a Jewish audience of how his parents survived the Armenian genocide.

League officials said it was unclear if the Jewish leaders in Turkey were acting on their own or at the behest of the Turkish government.

"AMOUNTED TO BLACKMAIL"

"There's no question that the attempts to cancel Judge Arabian's speech amounted to blackmail," said a league representative in Los Angeles. "The Jewish community in Turkey expressed terrible distress over threats to them because we attempted to establish a rapport with the Armenian community."

But the Assembly of Turkish American Assns., the largest Turkish-American lobbying group, denies that threats against the well-being of Turkish Jews were either expressed or implied when objections to the planned speeches were raised. They said the chief rabbi and other members of the Jewish community in Turkey approached U.S. Jewish organizations on their own, without pressure from the Turkish government.

The Turkish ambassador in Washington and the Turkish consul general in Los Angeles have refused to be interviewed for this story.

"When Turkish Jews speak out, they speak out without pressure from Turkey," said Nan Canter, executive director of the assembly, which has eight regional offices in the United States. "They are responding as members of the Turkish community and it is absolutely a misperception on the part of American Jewish leaders that some pressure and intimidation is involved."

The pressure felt by Jewish organizations is part of a growing national campaign by Turkey and Turkish-American lobbying groups to cast doubt on what most historians agree was a genocide in the obscure reaches of eastern Turkey between 1915 and 1918. Turkey denies that a genocide occurred and says that both Christian and Armenians and Muslim Turks died during a civil war prompted by an Armenian revolt.

The campaign attempts to discredit diplomatic cables sent to Washington in 1915 by U.S. Ambassador to Turkey Henry Morgenthau, detailing a "race extermination" of Armenians, arguing that Morgenthau was a virulent anti-Muslim and depended solely on the eyewitness accounts of Christian missionaries who ignored the deaths of Muslims.

In appeals to the Jewish community through personal lobbying and advertisments taken out in Jewish community newspapers, Turkey and Turkish-American groups have emphasized ties between an Armenian extremist group and the Palestinian Liberation Organization.

Canter said the assembly also tries to show that recognition of genocide is just one of several goals sought by Armenian political groups that, if realized, would bring great harm to Turkey, an important NATO ally and the only Muslim country other than Egypt to have relations with Israel.

But Hovannisian, the UCLA history professor, said the campaign is a thinly veiled attempt to create divisions between Jews and Armenians, who share a common history of persecution and exile. "A broad breach between the two communities would serve the purposes of the Turkish government," Hovannisian said. "The tone and tenor of the campaign is more strident than ever. They are leaving no stone unturned, no dollar unused, to perpetuate their denial."

There are indications that the campaign, which argues to Jewish groups that Armenians are diluting the impact of the Holocaust with their genocide claims, has had some impact.

Wood said the local Jewish Federation Council is unsure if it will sponsor future educational presentations on the Armenian genocide. The Jewish community in America is caught in the middle and must "walk a very tight rope on this issue," Wood said.

"We would be stupid to do anything that would jeopardize Jewish lives in Turkey, and we would also be stupid not to recognize Turkey's humanitarian effort in helping Jewish refugees cross the border," he continued. "Likewise, it would be equally stupid to turn our back on a politically active and influential Armenian community with which we feel a certain kinship because of the Holocaust and the genocide."

SEEK CHANGE IN SCHOOL BOOK

And Abraham Foxman, associate national director of the Anti-Defamation League, said the league has been asked by a visiting delegation of Turkish Jews to delete three articles on the Armenian genocide from its anthology "Holocaust and Genocide," which has been used in the New Jersey school system since 1983.

"How books used in New Jersey schools could come to the attention of the Jewish community in Turkey, I don't know," Foxman said. "We promised them that we would consider their objections and make changes where and if warranted."

Foxman, however, said his organization will continue to sponsor speeches on the Armenian genocide, despite the pressure.

Turkish-American groups say that a lobbying campaign, underscoring Turkey's role in NATO and pointing to the assassinations of Turkish diplomats by Armenian terrorists in Los Angeles and other cities worldwide, has succeeded in getting the State Department, the Pentagon and President Reagan to back away from formal recognition of the genocide.

Two weeks ago, Reagan angered Armenian community leaders when he refused to support April 24 as a national day of remembrance for Armenian victims, saying a joint congressional resolution to that effect might damage relations with Turkey and inadvertently encourage Armenian extremists. The resolution was defeated in 1983 and 1984 and appears headed for defeat again this year after heavy lobbying by the State Department.

Reagan's first public stance on the resolution comes at a time when Armenian-Americans are preparing to observe the 70th anniversary of the genocide. April 24, 1915 is the date Armenian civic, political and intellectual leaders in Istanbul were arrested, deported and killed, commencing the first systematically planned, government-sanctioned genocide of the 20th Century.

More than 300 survivors, many of them in their 80s and 90s, from around the country will gather Wednesday in Washington for a national commemoration. Southern California's Armenian community, which numbers more than 200,000, will sponsor several events this week, including a memorial service in Montebello.●

A TRIBUTE TO MR. RICHARD LELKO

HON. WILLIAM O. LIPINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. LIPINSKI. Mr. Speaker, today I would like to take a moment to recognize and honor Mr. Richard Lelko, the recipient of the Ray MacDonald Community Achievement Award for the month of January, 1985.

Richard Lelko, a successful and dedicated businessman from the southwest side of Chicago, is truly worthy of this award. For the first time in 14 years Richard spent this past month of January in Chicago instead of tending to his interests in Acapulco—an orphanage he helped found, the church he has become a benefactor to, and of course a little rest and relaxation. No matter where he travels, Richard's heart stays behind in Chicago, where over the past 35 years he and his wife, Marlene, have built the huge success of The Landmark, a catering business on Archer Avenue, and Lakefront Park Concessions, which serves the Lincoln Park Zoo, the beaches, and other recreational areas.

Richard was born and raised in the food line. His father was a Polish butcher and crafter of all those old world delicacies. Richard got the business fever early, and at the age of 17 he was even sponsoring his first softball team on the side.

Quality food and good courteous service are trademarks at the several banquet halls Richard and Marlene operate in Chicago, including the popular Burbank Manor and the Mayfield.

But the real reason for the Lelkos' success seems to be their compassionate approach to the customer. No matter how large or small the account, the customer gets the benefit of the doubt when troubles arise. They go the extra mile for Chicagoans, and as Richard says, "It always comes back to you—twofold."

It's a wonder that Richard ever has time for Acapulco. In addition to the demands of business, he is active in the Polish American Congress, Copernicus Foundation, Polish National Alliance, Polish American Welfare, the Ethnic Committee in Washington, DC, and the board of Catholic Charities, where he is currently working on a project to help unwed mothers and to assist with adoptions. Richard is also a member of the Knights of Columbus, 4th Degree, and the American Legion.

But Richard's favorite project is Casa Hogas del Nino, or Little Children's Home, In Acapulco, Mexico. On one of his vacations in Acapulco many years ago, Richard was looking for a church to attend mass. At the one he chose, be became friends with the padre, who told him that he feared that he would never realize his dream of opening an orphanage because of a lack of funds. Richard went back to Chicago and for over 5 years helped raise enough money to build the padre's orphanage for 100 boys. Their next effort is to raise funds for an orphanage for 100 girls. Richard is proud to report four success stories so far from the orphanage: an ordained priest, a medical student, a law student, and one studying contracting.

In the works for Richard is the sponsorship of a 5-minute program each Sunday on Channel 26 to focus on current events affecting Chicagoans of Slavic descent.

Richard's other achievements include an honorary doctorate degree in Humane Letters from Alliance College in Pennsylvania. He received this degree along with U.S. Representative DAN ROSTENKOWSKI. In 1982 Richard was named Humboldt Park "Man of the Year."

Richard and Marlene have been married for over 30 years. They have two daughters, both of whom are married, and four grandchildren.

Mr. Speaker, Richard Lelko's long-term goal as an active citizen of Chicago is to promote education programs in order to make the city a better place to live. His dedication and unlimited involvement in programs and campaigns to improve the quality of life in the community have long been the trademarks of Richard Lelko, and it is with this sense of determination that has earned him the Ray McDonald Achievement Award for the month of January 1985.●

FASCELL CALLS FOR ACTION ON ARMS CONTROL

HON. DANTE B. FASCELL

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, our colleagues should know that copies of the fiscal year 1986 arms control impact statements [ACIS] have been sent to their offices.

These reports reflect the administration's assessment of the arms control impact of such weapons programs as the MX missile, Trident submarine, the B-1 bombers, and the strategic defense initiative [SDI].

In my press release which follows, I warn about the adverse arms control impact of the administration's ASAT Program and call for the administration to reaffirm its commitment not to undercut the SALT limits and to seek a ban now on nuclear testing.

Rep. Dante B. Fascell (D-FL), Chairman of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, today released the fiscal year 1986 arms control impact statements (ACIS) on defense, nuclear weapons, and other programs. In releasing the committee print jointly with the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Chairman Fascell remarked:

"The fiscal year 1986 ACIS is an important reference for all Members of Congress who are seriously interested in and committed to arms control as an essential element of our country's national security. The reports will serve not only as a guide to the Congress in its consideration of major weapons systems but also as a reference to the administration's views on many arms control issues."

As mandated by Congress in section 36 of the Arms Control and Disarmament Act, the ACIS are prepared by the executive branch and submitted by the President to Congress in conjunction with the budget requests for defense, nuclear weapons, and Department of Energy weapons-related programs. Major weapons programs analyzed in this year's ACIS include the Trident submarine, MX missile, sea-launched cruise missiles, and the B-1 bomber. Also included for the first time is a separate section on the administration's Strategic Defense Initiative (SDI).

In his comments on the arms control analyses contained in the 1986 ACIS, Chairman Fascell expressed his concern that, while the reports reaffirmed the administration's commitment to U.S. treaty obligations, particularly to ABM and SALT, the reports were also less than forthcoming on specific issues of compliance and verification:

"There is growing concern about the issues that the sea trials of the seventh Trident submarine raise regarding the administration's professed commitment to not undercutting SALT limits. The ACIS report states that the administration 'has not made any decisions about possible compensations in order to remain within the appropriate limits.' I find this lack of certainty disturbing in light of what appears to be persistent administration waffling on our commitment to SALT. Let me emphasize that I take very seriously recent administration reports on Soviet non-compliance. What we preach we must also practice. I therefore believe that the administration's current position could undermine the ongoing Geneva arms control talks."

On the issue of anti-satellite weapons, Fascell observed:

"On the one hand, the arms control impact statement notes that effective and verifiable arms control agreements could be devised that would enhance the survivability of U.S. satellites. On the other hand, the report clearly indicates the administration's resolve to test and deploy an ASAT weapons system. In my opinion, these two goals—enhanced satellite survivability and ASAT deployment—are incompatible. To the contrary, the most effective way to constrain future threats to U.S. satellites would be to negotiate a ban on the testing and deployment of ASATs by both superpowers."

Noting that the Soviets have had a self-imposed moratorium on ASAT testing since 1982, Fascell said: "We should see if we can make that moratorium mutual and permanent thereby making an arms race in space less likely."

Fascell also voiced his frustration at the report's "lip service treatment" of various test ban proposals and reiterated that these initiatives are of immediate and pressing concern to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. The Chairman added:

"I am particularly disturbed that the administration is still unwilling to seek ratification of the Threshold Test Ban and the Peaceful Nuclear Explosions Treaties, signed by Presidents Nixon and Ford respectively. That failure is regrettable in light of the fact that the Senate adopted a resolution in the last Congress by a vote of 77-22 calling for the President to seek Senate ratification of these two treaties. It is equally, if not more, disturbing to also read in the FY 86 ACIS the administration's murky commitment to a Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty (CTB). Contrary to the administration's commitment to CTB as a 'long term goal,' the time is now, not later, to enter into serious negotiations. A comprehensive test ban would help curtail the arms race and send an important message to the nonnuclear weapons states that both the United States and the Soviet Union are committed to avoiding the proliferation of nuclear weapons. This message has added significance when we remember that the United States is now engaged in preparatory activities for the 1985 Nonproliferation Treaty Review Conference and that this treaty mandates that the United States, the Soviets, and all other parties to the treaty shall pursue negotiations relative to the cessation of the arms race."

Copies of the report can be obtained from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, Room 2169 Rayburn Building.●

CLEAN AIR ACT WARRANTY BILL

HON. WILLIAM E. DANNEMEYER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, today I am reintroducing a bill to alleviate the continuing problems created by anticompetitive and anticonsumer warranties contained in the Clean Air Act.

First, it would limit production and performance warranties on emission systems to 2 years/24,000 miles and make sure the list of parts covered is not subsequently expanded. It would specifically limit the 5 year/50,000-mile warranty to the catalytic converter, the thermal reactor, and parts solely used for emissions control. EPA would retain the right to recall emission system failures for 5 years/50,000 miles. Second, it further increases competition by repealing the counterproductive parts certification program and by doing away with the waiver that allows auto manufacturers to specify the use of one of their own parts. Third, it permits independent California auto parts dealers and repair shops to operate under the same warranty requirements that apply in other States. And finally, it clarifies the antitampering provisions of the law.

In 1977, Congress amended the Clean Air Act to protect the small businessman and the consumer from anticompetitive emissions warranties. Parts to be warranted for the extended period were limited to those that are installed primarily to control emissions.

EPA expanded the list of parts covered by the warranty through regulations. The Automotive Service Industry Association [ASIA] and the Automotive Parts Rebuilders Association [APRA] filed suit in 1980, asserting that the regulations were contrary to the Clean Air Act as amended in 1977. In a separate action, vehicle manufacturers and importers filed suit on the warranty and certification matters, and included a legal objection to the short test regulations issued by EPA. The court ordered consolidation of the cases, forcing joint consideration of aftermarket and vehicle manufacturer issues.

Prior to final court arguments, ASIA and APRA presented to EPA a technical report by Packer Engineering which analyzed the specific parts under consideration, the particular performance objectives of such parts and the historical nature of their use. Based on this report and other information supplied to EPA by ASIA and APRA, a tentative consensus was reached which would have substantially limited the parts subject to the extended 5 year/50,000-mile performance warranty

The court recognized that Congress did in fact act to reduce the anticompetitive effects of a broad coverage/long length warranty in 1977. However, it accepted the EPA interpretation that the warranty coverage for the first 2 years/24,000 miles was for all components affecting emissions. With respect to coverage after 2 years/24,000 miles, the court avoided a direct decision on the correctness of the parts list issued by EPA. The court stated that the parts list was advisory only and therefore not subject to attack.

The court did not disturb the liberties taken by EPA in misinterpreting the 1977 amendments to the Clean Air Act. EPA regulations provide that not only sole or primary parts must be warranted, but also secondary parts which fail because of a failed primary part. The court's decision on the certification issues transformed a congressional edict to provide a program to avoid monopoly into one which actually creates an anticompetitive situation worse than would occur if no such program were instituted.

EPA regulations provide that an aftermarket manufacturer who certifies parts is liable for all costs incurred by a vehicle manufacturer caused by the failure of that certified part. One issue before the court was how this liability was to be assumed. EPA regulations required reimbursement without detailing how such reimbursement was to be effected.

The court ruled that EPA must provide some forum for resolution of reimbursement disputes. Certifiers must, as a condition of certification, agree to such a reimbursement scheme. The court discussed the vehicle manufacturer's demand that parts manufacturers be required to post a bond to establish financial stability to actually perform under such a reimbursement scheme and in a concurring opinion that should strike terror in the heart of every small business, one judge went so far as to state that parts manufacturers should be required by EPA to post a bond in order to be certified and that: "The criticism that some aftermarket parts manufacturers might not be able to afford to post bond may be correct, but, it is just those manufacturers who could not afford to post a bond who need to be weeded out."

All administrative and legal remedies available to the independent aftermarket have now been pursued. Corrective legislation to put competition back into the law is needed. Such legislation must clearly remove the power of EPA to twist the intent of Congress.

Mr. Speaker, this is an ever growing problem and, from what southern California independent garages have shown me, it amounts to an extensive loss of business. In the 97th Congress I offered two bills dealing with this subject and one of them was almost completely incorporated into the comprehensive clean air bill, H.R. 5252, considered by the Energy and Commerce Committee. Unfortunately the measure did not become law because of the difficulty in resolving other issues. In the 98th Congress I introduced a similar measure which I hoped might be the solution to the problem. For all States, including California, the bill would have reduced the production and performance warranties to 2 years/24,000 miles for all emissions system parts.

Mr. Speaker, we are confronted with yet another example of good intentions gone astray. All of us want cleaner air, but the adverse effects of these warranties on the aftermarket and the consuming public cannot be justified or overlooked. They must be taken into account if we are interested in preserving competition and an important sector of the small business community. The legislation I have introduced today will restore and preserve that competition and, in the long run, provide the best guarantee of protection that consumers can have.

The concepts of my bill are supported by the Automotive Service Industry Association, the Motor and Equipment

Manufacturers Association, the Automotive Parts and Accessories Association, the Independent Automotive Service Association, the Automotive Warehouse Distributors Association, the National Tire Dealers and Retreaders Association, and the Automotive Service Councils.●

ST. PETERSBURG JUNIOR COLLEGE OPENS THE DOOR TO EDUCATION FOR MANY

HON. C.W. BILL YOUNG

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Mr. Speaker, providing high quality educational opportunities to Americans of all ages has been vital to our growth and development as a nation. The St. Petersburg Junior College is one institution that over the past 58 years has opened the door to education for many students in Pinellas County, FL.

The college was founded in 1927 by seven St. Petersburg parents who sought to provide a good, affordable education for their children and others throughout the county. The school opened its doors the first semester to 111 students and 15 faculty members. Today, the St. Petersburg Junior College has expanded to the point where 300 faculty members now teach more than 15,000 students at the college's three campuses in St. Petersburg, Clearwater, and Tarpon Springs. Even with its expansion, the college, its faculty, and its administration have maintained a reputation of providing students with a well-rounded, high-caliber education in a friendly atmosphere.

Among the college's 40,000 graduates are many national, State, and local leaders, including Carl M. Kuttler, the college's current president. He is the fifth president at the St. Petersburg Junior College and has served in this position for 7 years. Following my remarks, I would like to include a story by Eugene Morris from the April 8, 1985, St. Petersburg Times which traces in greater detail the history of the college.

The St. Petersburg Junior College is representative of the many community colleges throughout our Nation that provide a college education to students who otherwise might not receive such an opportunity. To recognize the achievements of the St. Petersburg Junior College and other community colleges, I am proud to cosponsor today House Joint Resolution 125 designating May 1985 as "National Community College Month." The thousands of Americans who have graduated from community colleges and contributed greatly to our Nation are living proof of just how valuable these institutions are to our educational system.

HEAD OF THE CLASS—DECADES OF TOP-NOTCH SERVICE EARN RAVES FOR SPJC

(By Eugene Morris)

Business was good in Florida during the early 1900s, too good to be true.

Real estate purchases came to a dead halt in 1926. Fewer tourists came to St. Petersburg. People stopped paying their taxes, and the city debt reached $26.7-million.

Before there was the Great Depression, there was the Florida Crash.

Seven St. Petersburg parents were so worried that their children couldn't afford to attend any of the state's universities that they started a community college of their own.

Hoping to insure that their sons and daughters could continue their educations after high school, they began St. Petersburg Junior College (SPJC) in an unused wing of St. Petersburg High School under the guidance of former Pinellas County School Supt. George M. Lynch.

Before there was a Florida Community College System, a Florida Association of Community Colleges or any other two-year institutions in Florida, there was SPJC, a private, nonprofit community college.

During its first semester in 1927, SPJC had 111 students and a faculty of 15. Lynch and six other prominent citizens became the college's first board of governors. Today, the college has more than 15,000 students, nearly 300 teachers and three campuses in St. Petersburg, Clearwater and Tarpon Springs.

One semester after it opened, the college was moved to an old building at Second Avenue N and Fifth Street near Mirror Lake. In 1937, it was moved to its present site at 66th Street and Fifth Avenue N.

Over the years, SPJC has been accredited, has become a public institution and has joined the Pinellas County School system. It was the second institution—after Palm Beach Junior College—to join the state community college system.

The 74-acre Clearwater campus opened in 1965, and the 54-acre Tarpon Springs Center opened 10 years later. In 1980, the old Webb's City store in Pinellas Park was purchased for the school's health education programs. A $6.5-million allocation from the Legislature went toward renovating the 10-acre, 170,000-square food building.

Today, SPJC's main campus in St. Petersburg is a serene oasis along Eagle Lake. The grounds are well kept, and most of the activity between classes is confined to the courtyard bounded by the gym, the cafeteria, the bookstore and the library.

After more than five decades, one thing has remained constant about SPJC: its solid reputation for preparing its students.

Last September, SPJC's sophomores who took the College Level Academic Skills Test (CLAST) had a 92 percent passing rate that topped most other Florida community colleges and bettered the state average by 5 percent. SPJC students' tied those at two state universities—Florida State and Central Florida—and were higher than those at five others. Only the University of Florida's sophomores scored higher.

"The people of Pinellas County really have a lot to be proud about with St. Pete Junior College," said Clark Maxwell, executive director of the state community college system in Tallahassee. "If I had to rate them with the other community colleges in the state, they'd be right up there near the top.

"They've kept up with the changing role of community colleges," he said. "They symbolize everything that a community college is supposed to be."

According to Jim Gollattscheck, vice president of communications with the American Association of Community and Junior colleges in Washington, SPJC is preparing students well to enter society after graduation. Gollattscheck is a former president of Valencia Community College in Orlando and a former acting superintendent with the Pinellas County schools.

"They've always had a great reputation around Florida and the nation for producing students who were eminently qualified to enter many different areas," he said. "I've never had any doubt about the quality of St. Pete Junior college because I've seen what its graduates have done."

Most students then and now said they chose SPJC because of its low tuition. In the late 1920s, everyone paid $50 a semester. These days, Florida residents are charged $21.75 per semester hour, and nonresidents must pay $43.75 per semester hour. Florida residents who attend lower level classes at the University of South Florida's Bayboro campus in St. Petersburg must pay $27.35 a semester hour, while nonresidents are charged $78.35.

Many of the courses at SPJC are designed to prepare students to transfer into four-year institutions, although the college uses a combination of special programs, flexible scheduling and low fees to draw students from throughout the country.

Donald Benn was the college's first student body president, graduating with the first class in 1929. Benn returned to SPJC four years later to become the first dean of men and to teach economics, political science and accounting.

"The tuition was kind of cheap back then, but the education wasn't," the St. Petersburg resident said. "The teachers were something else. They knew us all by name, and they were always making themselves accessible to us."

Some current faculty members and administrators said they wouldn't have it any other way.

"We have a caring attitude because that's the only way to do this job." said Myrtle Williams, dean of student services at the St. Petersburg campus. "You can't do something like this and not care about what happens to them."

"The flexibility I've found since I've been here has been remarkable," said Jerry Odom, provost of the St. Petersburg campus and president of the Florida Association of Community Colleges. "These people have proven that they can deal with just about anything."

More than 40,000 students have graduated from SPJC since that first class in 1929. They have entered such fields as medicine, politics, athletics, television, finance, education, entertainment and advertising.

Yvonne Mack, 18, said she chose SPJC to get prepared for a four-year school.

"You get your feet wet by coming to a community college instead of heading straight into a four-year program," she said.

Brenda Taylor, 26, who attends the Clearwater campus, says she likes the diversity of programs at SPJC.

"They're trying to make it more attractive for the everyday person who has to work and take care of other responsibilities as well as go to school," she said. "It works out real nice."

John Trotti, 45, a student at the Tarpon Springs campus, said he enjoys the college "because we have a lot of time to spend with the teachers in our special areas. They are knowledgeable about so many different things that it helps us learn better."

During its 58-year existence, SPJC has had five presidents. Carl M. Kuttler, the current president, has had the job for seven years. His predecessor Michael M. Bennett served for 28 years. Both were graduated from SPJC.

"Back then the college was a great place for a student to find out if they were serious about studying before entering a university," Bennett said. "We had phenomenal growth in those days, and the students were able to grow right along with the facility."

Even though the college now has three campuses and thousands of students, Kuttler said he thinks the school's open door policy is unmatched.

"This college is here for any student who is serious about wanting to better themselves," he said. "The door is open for their admission, and the door stays open if they ever want to talk to me or any other administrators."

"It was a joy watching people trying to upgrade themselves," Bennett said. "That really showed that our mission was getting accomplished."

Said Kuttler: "This place can offer so much to so many right now that our bounds seem almost endless."●

FAIRNESS IN VETERANS EDUCATION PROGRAMS

HON. SAM GEJDENSON

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. GEJDENSON. Mr. Speaker, earlier this year I was approached by two Navy members from Connecticut about an oversight they found in the new Educational Assistance Program Congress enacted last year. Today I am introducing legislation that would rectify this inequity and reestablish the House's intent when it originally passed the education bill.

As my colleagues know, last year as part of the Department of Defense Authorization Act of 1984 Congress established a new Educational Assistance Program for new enlistees. The original bill, as introduced by Chairman MONTGOMERY and passed by the House, offered active military personnel and new recruits an attractive and comprehensive package of education benefits.

During the conference on the DOD bill the House-passed education package was substantially altered. Under the new program only members who have continuous service or who enlist after July 1, 1985, and before June 30, 1988, are eligible for the new program.

As the law stands now, a significant number of Vietnam-era veterans who left service and rejoined after December 31, 1976, when the Vietnam-era GI bill expired have been omitted from the program.

The House has already acted this year to modify some of the restrictive eligibility requirements in the legislation passed last year and the Senate Armed Services Committee has passed legislation comparable to the measure I am introducing today.

One of the main reasons the House passed a comprehensive education program for military personnel was to recruit talented people to the All Volunteer Force, as well as to retain trained, qualified, and experienced personnel in the military. This Vietnam-era group that left service and later returned is just the type of experienced personnel the new education program was intended to attract.

Most of the broken service veterans have tremendous expertise from many years of service and would prefer to remain in the military. Unfortunately, many of these individuals will be forced to leave the service in order to meet time deadlines for other veteran education programs unless Congress acts.

It seems to me that if Congress does not act to correct this oversight and grant this group of Vietnam-era veterans eligibility to the new GI bill its original purpose will be thwarted. For this reason, I am introducing a bill to allow certain Vietnam-era veterans with a break in service to become eligible for benefits under the new GI bill Educational Assistance Program.

The bill I am introducing today covers a group that would have been included in the bill as passed by the House and is consistent with the intent of the current law—to retain qualified personnel. I hope that my colleagues will join with me to correct this oversight in order to help to retain a qualified group of soldiers in the service.●

A LITTLE LIFE INSURANCE FOR BLACK COLLEGES

HON. CARDISS COLLINS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mrs. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call to the attention of my colleagues, the following article found in the April 17, 1985, edition of the Washington Post. The article entitled "A Little Life Insurance for Black Colleges" was written by William Raspberry. The program described by Mr. Raspberry has been a successful attempt to provide small black colleges with long-term endowments. The response from the colleges and the insurance companies has been highly enthusiastic and it is my hope that other members of the private sector will participate to the same extent.

The article follows:

[From the Washington Post, April 17, 1985]

A LITTLE LIFE INSURANCE FOR BLACK COLLEGES

(By William Raspberry)

Black colleges, typically small and underfunded, are seldom in a position to refuse financial assistance—even when it is clear that the help will create nearly intractable problems down the road.

Frederick Douglass Patterson understands the dilemma well, having experienced it as a president of Tuskegee Institute and founder of the United Negro College Fund. Now the 83-year-old "retired" educator, with a generous assist from the insurance industry, is embarked on a program to do something about it.

"The chronic problem which our colleges face," he was saying the other day during a visit here from New York, "is that if you go to the foundations—the most likely source of financial assistance—you find they won't give to endowments. They give you restricted gifts, restricted both as to purpose and as to the time frame of expenditure.

"Still the gifts are received with gratitude, since there are very few things you can do for an undernourished undergraduate college that do not improve the quality of what they are trying to do. You're glad to have the quality, but then you're out of money to sustain the improvements.

"You may find that you've built into your operation better salaries for teachers, more books for the library, more science equipment, more of this, more of that—whatever the rating agencies say you need. Then you find yourself out of funds . . . so you end up financially worse off then you were before you got the money."

That was the dilemma. The solution: the College Endowment Funding Plan, a piece of financial wizardry that allows a college to turn an initial fund-raising effort of $300,000 into an endowment of more than $2 million in the space of 25 years, while drawing out $300,000 every year for current expenditures.

The key to the magic is the participation of the life and health insurance industry, whose members Patterson persuaded to make long-term, below-market-rate loans in multiples of $400,000.

It works this way: a participating college is eligible for a $50,000 bonus from the United Negro College Fund and a loan of $400,000 from an insurance company for each $300,000 unit the college is able to raise on its own. The $750,000 package is invested in long-term, high-quality, fixed-interest securities, with the interest (minus the $30,000-a-year in operating costs) plowed back.

For the first 15 years, the college pays only the interest (at two percentage points below market) on the loan. By the time the loan is fully repaid, the insurance company has made a decent return on its $400,000 investment and the college, which already has used $750,000 in operating money, has an endowment fund of nearly $2 million for each initial $300,000 unit.

"The first company to join the plan—Aetna—wanted to give us the money," Patterson said, "I told them we didn't want it as a gift because we needed the leverage of a loan to wake up the trustees of these colleges and get people out scrapping for the money. Besides, there wouldn't be enough companies willing to give us that kind of money. A safe loan with a good return is a different proposition.

"The reason for the $30,000 annual drawdown is that no college as hard up as these are is going to be very enthusiastic about the plan if they can't get something every year."

So far, enthusiasm has not been a problem, for either the colleges or the insurance companies. Thirty-one companies have made loans to 29 colleges, some of which have taken as many as five or six units. The $37.5 million invested to date is expected to produce endowments totaling well over $100 million in 25 years.

"It's been a phenomenally successful experience, especially for those small colleges that could never even dream of building an endowment," Patterson said. "Now if we could only get the rest of the private sector to get involved to the same extent. . . "●

WORKER SAFETY BILL

HON. GUY V. MOLINARI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. MOLINARI. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill which is designed to provide greater protection for our Nation's industrial work force and residents who live near chemical industrial facilities.

Twenty-five years ago Congress enacted into law the Occupational Safety and Health Act for the purpose of protecting workers from hazards which exist in the workplace. Since that time, however, a vast new array of chemicals have entered our environment whose potential impacts on human health are still largely unknown. Current law is clearly inadequate in safeguarding American workers from these new threats.

Under current law the circumstances which trigger reporting of an accidental spill or release are very limited: a release which results in a fatality or the hospitalization of five or more employees, or, a release which involves 1 or more of 16 chemicals listed by OSHA as carcinogenic.

Many very serious or potentially serious accidents do not require five or more employees to be admitted to a hospital. Similarly, the list of 16 chemicals does not comprise even a small percent of the hazardous substances existant in the working environment today. Consequently, potentially life-threatening accidents go unreported and defective operating procedures continue uncorrected.

It is time that we revise our national reporting requirements and hold the chemical industry accountable for hazardous conditions in the workplace. The bill which I am introducing today will tighten up the existing reporting regulations. It will replace the necessity of employee hospitalization prior to notification with a requirement that the area OSHA office be contacted if five or more employees merely receive medical treatment. Using medical treatment rather than actual hospital admittance as a requirement for reporting will help identify a hazardous situations before it results in worker illness rather than after. Such a requirement will also ensure sufficient reporting practices without the necessity of waiting indefinitely for OSHA to expand the list of 16 chemicals to include all hazardous substances.

Additionally, this bill will include OSHA on the list of several agencies which must be notified under the CERCLA and Clean Water Act statutes in the event of a chemical spill or release. This will enable OSHA representatives to determine whether an inspection of a facility is warranted and whether a plant is operating as it should.

This bill will provide better protection to the general public. Many workplace spills have the potential of escaping to the outside environment and posing threats to public health. Closer scrutiny of in-house accidents will help to prevent chemical releases from escaping to populated areas outside of the plant.

In sum, as our supply of chemicals continues to grow, so too, should our provision of safety expand both in and outside of the workplace.●

ENHANCING THE APOSTLE ISLANDS NATIONAL LAKESHORE

HON. DAVID R. OBEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. OBEY. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Representative JIM MOODY, and I are introducing legislation today which would further enhance the picturesque Apostle Islands National Lakeshore on the tip of the northern Wisconsin mainland in Lake Superior. Since Senator Gaylord Nelson created this unique Federal park in 1970, thousands of people have enjoyed the unspoiled beauty of the 20-island cluster in the world's largest freshwater lake.

The Apostle Islands are rich in Wisconsin history. From 1700 until the turn of the 20th century, the Apostles were the center of commercial activity on Lake Superior. In the early 1900's, nearby towns on the mainland grew quickly to serve the needs of loggers, shippers, fishermen, and tourists.

Today, the Apostles still provide an economic base of support for the surrounding communities, but they are enjoyed mostly for their recreational and scenic value by both tourists and year-round residents alike.

My bill would add an environmentally important and scenic island to the national lakeshore—a sandspit called Long Island.

Adding Long Island to the Apostles park would provide for many more people to enjoy the recreational area, especially because it is easily accessible to several marinas, particularly the one in Washburn and the proposed Ashland Marina.

Long Island is also one of the last remaining habitats in the Great Lakes region of two seriously endangered birds species, the piping plover and the common tern. The U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service estimates that there are fewer than 20 nesting pairs of plovers left in the area.

As part of the national lakeshore, the island would be managed so that these species, as well as many other shore birds that congregate on the sandy beach and low dunes each year, would be protected.

The island is also geologically significant, offering researchers a unique opportunity to study the processes which cause the creation of a barrier island.

I believe Long Island would be a valuable addition to the Apostle Islands Naitonal Lakeshore. It would round out a park which is, in my opinion, a national treasure.

I urge my colleagues to give this bill their support.●

CONGRESSIONAL SALUTE

HON. ROBERT A. ROE

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. ROE. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday, April 27, the people of my congressional district and State of New Jersey will join with the Board of Trustees of the Passaic County Community College at its First Merit Scholarship Dinner to honor the president of the college, a most distinguished member of our community, and good friend—the honorable Gustavo A. Mellander of Wayne, NJ—whose standards of excellence and personal extraordinary commitment to quality education have truly enriched our community, State and Nation. I know that you and our colleagues here in the Congress will want to join with me in extending our deepest appreciation to Dr. Mellander for all of his good works and share great pride with his good wife Nelly in the success of his achievements in seeking life's fulfillment and purpose.

Mr. Speaker, when you reflect upon the fact that the cultural, historical, and economic achievements—even the basic health, well-being, and longevity of a State and Nation—depend in large measure upon how well we educate each generation charged with the trust of carrying out its responsibilities and traditions, we can indeed be proud of Dr. Mellander's outstanding contribution to the quality of life and way of life for all of our people.

For the past decade Dr. Mellander has served with eminence as president of Passaic County Community College, a thriving academic facility in Patterson, NJ, which has achieved distinguished academic recognition as an urban 2-year community college of renown in the world of established and respected colleges and universities under the leadership of Dr. Mellander. Under his direction the college has expanded its facilities to provide a substantive learning experience for our young people through a most comprehensive program of education which has attained national recognition for its no-nonsense, rigorous, and effective approach to education.

Mr. Speaker, the quality of leadership and sincerity of purpose that Dr. Mellander has imparted to our people are mirrored in his many accomplishments and the warmth of his friendship that have won him the confidence and support of all of us who have the good fortune to know him. This is particularly manifested in the strong support and depth of friendship that he enjoys among government, business, civic, religious, educational, and other community leaders who organized this testimonial to the many contributions he has made in the field of education. This committee of outstanding citizens stresses the importance of Dr. Mellander's achievements not only to Passaic County Community College but to the entire State of New Jersey. They point with pride to the aspiring young people of Passaic County and throughout New Jersey who have been the most immediate beneficiaries of Dr. Mellander's splendid work and applaud the benefits that are accruing as a result of the college's outstanding courses of study in business administration, computer technology, accounting and marketing that have been launched at the college under Dr. Mellander's administration.

Dr. Gustavo A. Mellander has indeed earned the highest respect and esteem of all of us. He was born in California, educated during his early years in Panama, and attended college and graduate schools in the United States. He came to Passaic County Community College from the New Jersey State Department of Higher Education where he had served as a director following his service as academic dean of York College, PA. He was a member of the New Jersey State Board of Education and served on many other local, State, regional, and national committees concerned with educational equity and excellence. He will be leaving his high office of public trust as president of Passaic County Community College to accept the presidency of Mission College in Santa Clara, CA.

Mr. Speaker, Dr. Mellander has served our people and our country with honor and distinction. New Jersey's loss will be California's gain. He is an outstanding administrator, educator, and good friend whose richness of wisdom and expertise in his daily pursuits have touched the lives of many, many people. As we gather together on April 27 in tribute to Dr. Mellander's leadership endeavors and personal commitment dedicated to the education of our young people, we do indeed salute an esteemed educator, outstanding community leader, and great American—the honorable Gustavo Mellander of Wayne, NJ.●

MERGERS ALTER 500 LARGEST COMPANIES

HON. EDWARD J. MARKEY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. MARKEY. Mr. Speaker, I want to call to my colleagues attention an article from the Washington Post which highlights the effect of hostile takeovers on our economy.

Takeover activity is proceeding at a feverish pace, and many economists and regulators choose to take a laissez-faire view of this activity. I recommend this article to those people since it outlines the effect hostile takeovers have had on the largest corporations.

I point out this change not to argue for action or nonaction is one particular case. The point of this article, and the reason I find it noteworthy, is that our economy is being revolutionized by Wall Street arbitrageurs, and we are sitting here not even sure what is taking place.

Nineteen companies have dropped off Fortune's 500 list because they were taken over. That figure represents the largest Fortune 500 purge since the magazine has kept count of such business trivia for 31 years.

The other notable, and I find disturbing element of this article is the report of the rise in long-term debt. Why have these companies taken on such enormous debt? The main reason for the expansion of long-term debt by the largest corporations in America is not for productive investments, not for capital outlays that will make our economy stronger next year, but this enormous debt has gone to purchases of stock by companies. Long-term debt has risen because the largest corporations in America are worried about being taken over in a hostile bid.

This fear is not something we can easily ignore. This article reports that "the stock buyback phenomenon helped lower the total market value of Forbes top 500 companies, in December 1984, to an estimated $1.27 trillion, $50 billion below the previous year's total." Clearly, takeover mania is robbing corporate assets and should be addressed in a rational way.

The article follows:

MERGERS ALTER LISTS OF COMPANIES

What do Gulf, Getty Oil, Republic Steel, Prentice-Hall and St. Regis all have in common?

All of them disappeared last year from Fortune magazine's list of the 500 largest industrial corporations, casualties of the takeover and merger wave sweeping through American business.

In all, nineteen companies dropped off the list last year because other firms swallowed them up, the largest disappearance due to acquisitions in the 31 years Fortune has published the list. The 1984 Fortune 500 directory went on newsstands last week.

Gulf, No. 11 in 1983, was acquired by Chevron, Getty Oil, No. 24, became a part of Texaco. The Continental Group, No. 68, was snapped up by David Murdock and the Kiewit-Murdock Investment Corp.

And in a rare double play, Norton Simon, No. 136, was acquired by Esmark, No. 88, which then was absorbed by Beatrice Foods, No. 36. Farther down the line, Republic Steel, No. 145, was acquired by LTV and Superior Oil, No. 196, became part of Mobil. Prentice-Hall, No. 477 was added to Gulf & Western's publishing stable and St. Regis, No. 141, was acquired by Champion International.

As the list shows, what helped make 1984 special was the oil industry mergers, as the low value of oil company stocks drew takeover raiders and bargain hunters like bees to honey.

The annual rankings, published by Fortune, and more recently, by Forbes magazine, provide snapshots of some major developments in American business. (The two lists differ in several ways—Fortune's includes only industrial firms while Forbes', also just out, includes service and financial companies).

A determined campaign to cut overhead took its toll on both white collar and blue collar workers. The companies on Forbes' top 500 list (ranked by sales) cut their employment rolls by 840,000, or 4 percent last year, although sales rose by 5.5 percent. That meant a gain in productivity for the big companies which boosted their sales per employe to $133,000, up 10 percent, or faster than the gain in inflation. Put another way, the top 500 accounted for more than 21 percent of the nation's total civilian employment five years ago. Last year, they provided less than 19 percent of the jobs. The job growth is coming primarily from firms too small to make the top 500.

Profits were a disappointment. Although the gross national product rose 10.8 percent last year, profits for the companies on the Forbes list totaled $139.6 billion, up only 6 percent.

International Business Machines led all companies with $6.6 billion in profits, up 20 percent from 1983. It ranked second in 1983. American Telephone & Telegraph, the profit leader in 1983 fell to 12th after its breakup. IBM's profits exceeded the sales of all but the top 89 companies on Forbes' list, including such high-tech firms as Hewlett-Packard, Digital Equipment, Honeywell, Raytheon, Texas Instruments and Control Data.

The biggest profits gainers on Forbes list: Freuhauf, up 914 percent; Penn Central, up 762 percent; Allied Corp., up 727 percent and Continental Corp., up 606 percent. The biggest losers, in percentage terms: Texaco, down 75 percent, thanks to a $765 million write-down for tankers, refineries and reserves; Public Service of Indiana, down 67 percent; Colgate-Palmolive, off 64 percent, and Atlantic Richfield off 63 percent.

Fortune, in its tally, notes that the major industrial companies have not kept up with the overall pace of economic growth. The nominal gross national product in 1984 was up 24 percent over the pre-recession peak in 1981, not counting the effects of inflation. But sales for the Fortune 500 companies actually declined 1 percent in that period and profits were up only 2.6 percent over 1981. A strong profits gain in the beginning of 1984 petered out in midyear.

"What went wrong," notes Fortune, "was the implacable rise of the U.S. dollar. . . ." The dollar climbed by 72 percent over the low point in 1980 and 12 percent in just the second half of 1984. It battered companies like Colgate-Palmolive, that depend heavily on overseas business, or those that are vulnerable to import competition, like machine tool companies, semiconductor producers and carton manufacturers.

Forbes' rankings note another key development of 1984—the rise in long-term debt as companies borrowed to buy their own stock, either to take advantage of bargain prices, or to finance maneuvers in the takeover wars. It cites Teledyne, which bought up almost half its outstanding stock last year, nearly doubling long-term debt. For healthy companies, the stock buyback makes sense. For others, it adds a heavy new risk.

The stock buyback phenomenon helped lower the total market value of Forbes top 500 companies, in December 1984, to an estimated $1.27 trillion, $50 billion below the previous year's total.

FORTUNE'S TOP 6 INDUSTRIAL CORPORATIONS IN 1984

Company	Sales	Net income	Employes	Total return to investors (percent)	Rank on return
Exxon	$90.9 billion	$5.5 billion	150,000	29.36	31

THE DISINFORMATION OF THE SANDINISTAS

HON. ROBERT H. MICHEL

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday, April 23, 1985, the Wall Street Journal published an informative account of the way in which the worldwide disinformation program of the Sandinista Communists of Nicaragua misinformed our Nation as to the true state of affairs in that country.

At this point I wish to insert in the RECORD, "A Lobbying Drive Began in Managua" by Jim Denton, from the Wall Street Journal, Tuesday, April 23, 1985.

A LOBBYING DRIVE BEGAN IN MANAGUA

(By Jim Denton)

The likely congressional defeat of President Reagan's proposal to provide military aid to the anti-Sandinista contra forces comes in the wake of an extraordinary lobbying campaign. The struggle for the hearts and minds of Congress has mobilized a handful of partisans who have been enormously effective in distorting the Nicaraguan human-rights story. Although it is not uncommon for foreign governments to try persuasion on Capitol Hill, the manner and degree to which the Sandinistas have manipulated public and congressional opinion is noteworthy.

A review of the origins, the dubious handling and the reception of a report recently released by Rep. Samuel Gejdenson (D., Conn.), and two putative human-rights groups provides a case study of how Sandinista propaganda is legitimized and makes its way into the public debate and, ultimately, congressional policy.

The Washington, D.C., law firm of Reichler & Applebaum is the Nicaraguan government's official registered agent in the U.S. For its services, the firm is paid an annual rate of about $320,000. From all outside appearances the firm has ably represented its client. An accounting of the lobbyists' appointments with legislators and staff reads like a Who's Who among Senate and House liberals.

But Reichler & Applebaum's lobbying efforts on the Sandinistas' behalf have gone beyond the congressional routine. In an interview, Mr. Reichler confirmed that some months ago he originated and orchestrated a plan to send a team of "professional attorneys to Nicaragua to conduct an objective, independent investigation of contra atrocities."

Reed Brody, a 31-year-old lawyer, and Jim Bordeloin, a law-school student, were selected to conduct the "objective investigation." They spent four months in Nicaragua taking statements from witnesses of resistance-force atrocities, all with the full cooperation of the Sandinistas. Mr. Brody confirms that most of the investigators' in-country transportation, boarding, housing, office space, staff and, one can assume, the witnesses themselves, were provided compliments of their Marxist hosts and sympathizers in Managua.

Upon completion of the "investigation," the 141-page Brody Report, consisting of nearly 150 sworn affidavits from "witnesses," was duly processed back through the Sandinistas' lobbyists at Reichler & Applebaum. There it was prepared in final form and, according to a report submitted to the House Foreign Affairs Subcommittee on Western Hemisphere Affairs, passed to the Washington Office on Latin America (WOLA), the International Human Rights Law Group and Rep. Gejdenson for public dissemination.

These three parties all have their individual biases, WOLA, for example, has been a particularly prolific and harsh critic of the human-rights records of Latin American governments friendly to the U.S., as well as the contras, and sympathetic to the Sandinistas and other Marxist insurgents in the region. In reviewing WOLA reports, articles and studies, no serious or critical account of Fidel Castro's human-rights record in Cuba could be found. It is also worth noting, in weighing the group's objectivity, that two former WOLA employees are now employed by the Nicaraguan Foreign Ministry.

Apparently recognizing that a hasty embrace of the Sandinista-sponsored Brody report might be viewed with skepticism, Rep. Gejdenson, WOLA and the Law Group assembled a second delegation to verify the Brody findings. This second delegation consisted of Michael Glennon, former chief counsel to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee under the chairmanship of Frank Church; Donald Fox, a New York City-based international human-rights lawyer-activist; Valerie Miller, the delegation's interpreter, who lived in post-revolutionary Nicaragua for two years and wrote a book on the Sandinista literacy campaign; and, as an observer, a staff aide to Rep. Gejdenson, Mr. Fox confirmed that his Nicaraguan-born wife, now a U.S. citizen, Ana Clemenzia Tercero, accompanied the group to Managua to visit family members at WOLA's expense. Ms. Tercero's brother is a high-ranking official in the Nicaraguan Foreign Ministry assigned to Rome. This group uncovered no discrepancies in the Brody findings after having corroborated only 10 of the nearly 150 Brody affidavits during its one-week visit to Nicaragua.

Then, on March 7, in releasing the Sandinista-sponsored Brody Report, Rep. Gejdenson, WOLA and the Law Group called for a congressional investigation into contra atrocities before a packed press conference on Capitol Hill. Mr. Gejdenson stated he was forwarding the report to Rep. Lee Hamilton (D., Ind.), chairman of the House Intelligence Committee, and Rep. Michael Barnes (D., Md.), chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Subcommittee on Western Hemisphere Affairs, of which Mr. Gejdenson is a member. In their prepared press statements, Mr. Gejdenson, WOLA and the Law Group did not mention the Sandinistas' role in originating and facilitating the Brody Report.

Last week the House Western Hemisphere Affairs Subcommittee held several days of hearings on aid to the contras. At Thursday's session, at the request of Mr. Gejdenson, Mr. Brody testified before the committee and had his report entered into the Congressional Record. Mr. Fox also testified, embracing the Brody report. And, apparently in order to gain some distance from the Sandinista-inspired document, Mr. Fox submitted a second report written by himself, Mr. Glennon, the Law Group and WOLA. The findings of this report substantiated and reinforced the Brody report.

The Brody document made its was into the public and congressional debate with a splash. The media fallout included articles in the Washington Post and the New York Times, and network coverage, including about 2½ minutes on the CBS Evening News. None of these accounts seriously challenged the report's origins or handling, ignoring or playing down the Sandinista sponsorship to the point that it was virtually unrecognizable to the audience.

The overall impact of the press accounts and congressional responses served the purposes of a Marxist regime to distort the U.S. public and Congress's understanding of the human-rights saga in Nicaragua—all of which will continue to shape U.S. policy in that war-torn country.●

U.S. CHURCHES IGNORE BLACK SOUTH AFRICANS ON DISINVESTMENT

HON. JACK FIELDS
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, I'm placing into the RECORD a recent book review by columnist Allan Brownfeld. Mr. Brownfeld's review of "The Politics of Disinvestment: Churches and Foreign Investment in South Africa," by Richard Sincere, published by the Ethics and Public Policy Center in Washington, addresses the issue of "disinvestment" as a tool for pressuring social and political change in South Africa.

According to Mr. Brownfeld and Mr. Sincere, the World Council of Churches [WCC] and the National Council of Churches [NCC] insist upon attacking apartheid through isolation, disinvestment, and embargoes. Many spokesmen for these umbrella church organizations are on record supporting Marxist terrorist groups, and their interpretations of Christianity often resemble St. Lenin more than St. Paul.

That is to say, spokesmen for the WCC and the NCC seem to demonstrate the socialist mindset: Too often their sociological and political proposals evidence a tendency to oversimplify human nature and reduce the complex human person to a more manageable unit; with the end result that a human's value would rest ultimately upon the degree to which he fitted in with the dictates of the state. Is this not precisely the result and pattern set by the self-proclaimed revolutionary states in Africa with which many of these churchmen seem enamored? It still remains that one of the key questions regarding social and political evolution in South Africa is this one: "Which current state in Africa would you most like South Africa to pattern itself after?" With the WCC and the NCC openly supporting and aiding Marxist terrorist groups, and calling for policies destined to bring more unemployment, more poverty, increased civil unrest, and violent upheaval to South Africa it is easy to answer that question for them. Angola and Mozambique quickly come to mind.

On the other hand, the book and its reviewer point out that many leaders of the black community within South Africa, such as labor leader Lucy Mvubelo, avidly support increased investments by Western firms. Such supporters of investment live and experience the beneficial results of employment, significant wage increases, equal-opportunity codes, and so forth, offered by Western firms in South Africa. Interestingly enough, most church leaders within South Africa also appear to support continued economic investment in South Africa from abroad, and insist that disinvestment would hurt mostly those people it is intended to help.

Mr. Speaker, the article follows:

[From Human Events, Apr. 13, 1985]

U.S. CHURCHES IGNORE BLACK SOUTH AFRICANS ON "DISINVESTMENT"

(By Allan C. Brownfeld)

The campaign to isolate South Africa economically, to pass legislation calling for U.S. disinvestment, and to withdraw American business from that country has been increasingly vocal in recent weeks.

While the campaign has been led by radical organizations such as Trans-Africa, which openly support violent revolution and provide aid and support to such pro-Soviet terrorist groups as the South West Africa Peoples Organization (SWAPO) and the African National Congress (ANC), another key element in the coalition urging disinvestment has been American church groups, as well as the World Council of Churches (WCC).

The WCC, through its Program to Combat Racism (PCR), has provided financial aid to the Marxist terrorist organizations. It rejects evolutionary change in South Africa and calls, instead, for the violent overthrow of existing institutions. WCC publications characterize Ronald Reagan and members of his Administration as "racist." In fact, a 1982 PCR report declared, "Rarely before has racism been such a consistent component of U.S. policy formulations."

A similar position, of course, has been taken by the American National Council of Churches (NCC), which is affiliated with the WCC. A number of denominations have followed suit.

The United Presbyterian Church has called not only for disinvestment but has urged the U.S. government to deny export licenses to U.S. firms doing business in South Africa, impose penalties on income earned there, terminate Export-Import Bank credits, exclude South African operations from the insurance program provided by the Overseas Private Investment Corp., and prohibit the sale of Krugerrands in the U.S.

The United Methodist Church not only supports economic sanctions against South Africa, but calls for support for terrorist groups such as SWAPO. The list of such pronouncements by American churches is a long one.

In a new study, "The Politics of Sentiment—Churches and Foreign Investment in South Africa,"* published by the Ethics and Public Policy Center of Washington, D.C., those churches which call for disinvestment and the economic isolation of South Africa are sharply criticized. Those who advocate such positions, the report declares, are ignoring both the long-run best interests and the current opinions of the vast majority of black South Africans.

They are overlooking, in addition, the dramatic changes now taking place in South Africa and moving that country in the direction of greater freedom and opportunity for men and women of all races.

In introducing the study, Dr. Ernest Lefever, president of the Ethics and Public Policy Center, declared, "Although frequently cited by American church leaders who advocate the withdrawal of U.S. companies from South Africa, Bishop Desmond Tutu does not speak for the majority of black leaders in his country on the controversial issue of foreign investment there. Despite the international acclaim he has won, Bishop Tutu is virtually isolated in his call for withdrawing foreign investments from South Africa.

The foreword to the study is written by black South African labor leader Lucy Mvubelo, who serves as general secretary of the National Council of South Africa. She states:

"I am a worker and trade unionist living in Soweto who knows how the ordinary African worker suffers under the discriminatory effects of apartheid. I want fuller participation by my black co-workers and all groups in the economy and political system. . . . I have heard all the arguments and proposals for changing our internal situation through external pressures to isolate South Africa from Western democracies, but I am not convinced.

"To proponents of isolation, disinvestment and embargoes, I must say: Don't break off contact, and don't advocate disengagement and withdrawal of foreign investments. . . . Foreign investment has created jobs for thousands of African workers who would otherwise not be employed.

"Thanks to the policies of foreign firms operating here, black workers have gained significant wage increases, often larger than the increases gained by black workers in South African companies. These workers enjoy the benefits of equal-opportunity codes adopted by American and European firms. . . . The vitality of South Africa's economy offers more hope to South African blacks than destructive forms of pressure from abroad."

Discussing the role of Western churches in particular, Mrs. Mvubelo argues that ". . . church leaders are often misguided and often ill-informed, and their statements and activities remain unexamined in light of the actual conditions in South Africa. Those who insist that Christian vision requires them to support revolutionary change in South Africa fail to acknowledge any reform in South Africa and fail to see—or turn a blind eye to—the effects violent revolution will have."

While most church leaders in the U.S. advocate some form of disinvestment, the author of the study, Richard E. Sincere Jr., points out that most church leaders within South Africa itself reject such an approach. Sincere writes:

"With the exception of leaders at the South African Council of Churches, notably Bishop Tutu, and independent groups such as the Christian Institute, most church leaders in South Africa appear to support continued economic investment from abroad and thus to be against disinvestment. They encourage businesses to treat their employees fairly, following the Sullivan Principles or the SACC code.

"Many insist that disinvestment would hurt most the very people it is intended to help. Some express grave doubts over the efficacy of an externally imposed disinvestment strategy, and others have registered their concern over the World Council of Churches' support of violent liberation movements in southern Africa and elsewhere."

It is Sincere's view that those American churches which have been in the forefront of the campaign for disinvestment have been woefully misinformed about the dynamic changes taking place within South Africa.

He reports in detail about an end to jobs reservation—that legislation which reserved certain jobs and occupations for whites.

Blacks in South Africa now have the right to organize labor unions. Per capital income figures for blacks and other non-whites in South Africa now range from two to five times higher than those of blacks in independent black countries. This, he argues, explains why one million "guest workers" from neighboring countries choose to work in South Africa.

Since 1970, the real earnings of nonwhite workers in industry and mining have been rising more sharply and more steadily than those of white workers. Between 1970 and 1979, the wage gap narrowed in all economic sectors. Real wages for blacks tripled between 1970 and 1979.

Blacks in cities and suburbs, the study points out, now have the right to buy their own homes and the government has launched a massive electrification program in Soweto, the large black township outside of Johannesburg. Etienne Van Loggerenberg of Rand Afrikaans University estimates that in the five years prior to 1982, Soweto household incomes increased by 50 per cent. In 1970, said economist Arnt Spandau, the whites' share of total personal incomes in South Africa was 75 per cent compared to 25 per cent for non-whites. But 1980 the proportion had changed to 60 and 40 per cent.

Other dramatic changes in South Africa are discussed in detail, including the new constitution of November 1983 which brought certain non-whites—Indians and members of the Colored (mixed-race) community—into the political process for the first time. Sincere shows that "The expanding wage rates of the 1970s and early 1980s have given the black community, especially in urban areas, increased economic power. This has forced the government to let blacks in cities and suburbs buy their own homes . . . ."

Continued economic growth, the author points out, will mean that more and more jobs will be available for black South Africans. Such economic growth, he states, is the best way to improve racial conditions. In this connection he quotes a number of careful observers of these trends. Thus, economist Walter Williams declares:

"Above all, it is South Africa's economic growth that is breaking the back of apartheid. Rapid economic growth makes racial discrimination costly. A growing robust economy tends to reduce racial hostilty and awareness; a decling or stagnating economy does the opposite. After all, can any sane person argue that American blacks could have just as easily achieved the social, political and economic gains of the 1960s boom during the bust of the 1930s?"

Herman Nickel, now U.S. ambassador to South Africa, wrote in Fortune magazine in 1978: "In broad historical terms, there appears to be little logic or reason in the idea that economic stagnation provides a better backdrop for the peaceful transformation of South Africa from institutionalized racism into a multiracial society. The notion would seem all the more bizarre when put forward by Americans, for the whole history of racial progress in the United States points in the opposite direction.

"Practically every major step forward was linked with economic progress. . . . Economic growth did not stengthen the system of institutionalized racism in the United States; it effectively destroyed it."

This report cites the support of the overwhelming majority of black South Africans for continuing U.S. business involvement in South Africa—something which is completely ignored by American church pronouncements on the subject. The evidence is impressive.

In an effort to explore "the relationships between political attitudes and industrial issues among blacks in South Africa," the U.S. Department of State commissioned the highly regarded Centre for Applied Social Sciences at the University of Natal to undertake research into the attitudes of black workers. The findings, described by Prof. Lawrence, Schlemmer who heads the Centre, as "remarkable," found that three-quarters of South Africa's black production workers support foreign investment in South Africa and reject disinvestment and boycott as a strategy for improving conditions.

A genuine—elected—black leader, Gatsha Buthelezi, chief minister of KawZulu, declares, "Public opinion surveys have shown that the majority of black people support continued investment by Western capital. . . . There is not a single trade union which supports the policy of disinvestment. So I get my cues from ordinary people. The ordinary man-in-the-street in South Africa has never said he is for disinvestment."

If U.S. investment were to leave South Africa, Sincere writes, "Politically and economically devastating consequences could hardly result. . . . The $2 billion in U.S. investments—less than half the amount held by British firms—is not enough to make a significant difference." But, he states, "There is reason to fear that employment policy toward blacks would be less enlightened under non-U.S. ownership, and that the whole American initiative toward fair labor practices would be significantly eroded."

It is clear, Sincere notes, that many advocates of disinvestment "hope that economic pressure on South Africa will lead to revolution." Yet, he shows, "violent overthrow of the government is unlikely to produce the desired end of greater justice and freedom for all non-white South Africans." He quotes Prof. Samuel Huntington of Harvard, the respected political scientist, as saying:

"When in world history has violent revolution produced a stable democratic regime in an independent state? Except for Costa Rica, never. All revolutionary opponents of authoritarian regimes claim to be democrats; once they achieve power through violence, almost all turn out to be authoritarian themselves, often imposing an even more repressive regime than the one they overthrew."

Similarly, Yale political scientist Robert A. Dahl is quoted as stating that stable democracies "are more likely to result from rather slow evolutionary processes than from revolutionary overthrow of existing regimes."

Among the problems with church pronouncements concerning South Africa, the study declares, "is their failure to acknowledge the possible adverse consequences of a chaotic or revolutionary South Africa for the security of the United States, Europe, Japan, Canada—indeed, the whole free world." Totally ignored, for example, is the strategic importance of the Cape Sea Route and of South Africa's strategic minerals. Moscow has its eye on South Africa, something the WCC and its American friends either overlook or, somehow, welcome.

The support given by the WCC and many American religious denominations for radical terrorism in southern Africa, this study states, "is contrary to the standards of the Christian just-war tradition. The WCC declared in 1948 that 'war as a method of settling disputes' is incompatible with the Gospel of Jesus Christ, but now it actively supports—with money, personnel and public pronouncements—terrorist groups seeking to overthrow the South African government through subversion, terrorism and guerrilla warfare. . . . The rejection of violence and espousal of constructive, peaceful change is conspicuously absent from the statements and activities of the WCC and most U.S. denominational statements."

Another serious shortcoming to be found in the approach to South Africa of many religious bodies is, the study points out, that "the churches have failed to consider (perhaps even deliberately ignored) alternative points of view in their pronouncements . . . the WCC said flatly that those who support evolutionary change are supporters of apartheid and racists.

"Most American church documents cite only the Christian Institute and Bishop Desmond Tutu as South African authorities. The evidence shows that these sources are not an accurate reflection of South African religious opinion. Furthermore, no American church document made reference to the views of South African trade-union leaders, members of the opposition parties such as Helen Suzman or Robert Conway, or black leaders like Gatsha Buthelezi, who consistently have opposed both apartheid and disinvestment and related tactics of isolation."

It is a strange morality indeed which seeks to make life in South Africa worse than it may become better at a later date when we see dramatic change already taking place.

The distinguished South African author Alan Paton, who has devoted much of his life to fighting the apartheid system, addressed an open letter to Bishop Tutu, one of the vocal advocates of disinvestment. He wrote in the Johannesburg Sunday Times (Oct. 21, 1984):

"Bishop Titu, I want to ask you a . . . question. I do not understand how your Christian conscience allows you to advocate disinvestment. I do not understand how you can put a man out of work for a high moral principle.

"You and I both know well the parable of the sheep and the goats, and we know well the importantance that Jesus attached to the feeding of the hungry and giving of water to the thirsty. You could put a man out of a job and make his family go hungry so that some high moral principle could be upheld.

"It would go against my own deepest principles to advocate anything that would put a man—and especially a black man—out of a job. Therefore, I cannot understand your position. I think your morality is confused just as was the morality of the church in the Inquisition, or the morality of Dr. Verwoerd in his utopian dreams. You come near to saying that the end justifies the means, which is a thing no Christian can do."

Sincere concludes this important study with a series of recommendations for those churches and church leaders which seek to have a truly affirmative impact upon the future of South Africa and race relations in that country.

He declares that "Church leaders need to be better informed about the political and economic facts. Too often they accept the false notion that South Africa is a repressive, totalitarian country similar to Nazi Germany. In fact the country is diverse, pluralistic, dynamic and rapidly changing. There are many forces within the government, the churches, the economy and South African society as a whole that lend themselves to further liberalization."

In addition, Sincere, with an abundance of evidence amassed to support his position, argues that "The U.S. corporate presence in South Africa, though certainly not above reproach, is a force for good.

"Most U.S. firms advance the cause of human dignity. They increase the material well-being of workers and their families, they adhere to non-segregation standards that break down the walls of apartheid, and they invest in community projects that promote human development . . . . American churches should therefore oppose actions . . . . to limit U.S. business in South Africa. On the contrary, they should encourage the expansion of U.S. business there because American firms contribute to productivity and prosperity and thus help create a climate for conservative change.

"The churches should also oppose terrorist movements bent on destroying South African government and society. The country has an independent judiciary, a remarkably free press, active human-rights groups, opposition political parties, and an electoral process that permits change. To support revolution despite the presence of effective channels for peaceful change is not only counterproductive but also immoral."

In the growing debate over the U.S. role in South Africa, this study deserves to be a key element and to play an important part. Those who reject its thoughtful conclusions must be asked to bear the burden of proving that their own calls for disinvestment would not do more harm than good, would not hurt the very people they say they want to help. It is unlikely that they will be able to do so.●

A REMINDER TO THE PRESIDENT

HON. GEORGE E. BROWN, JR.

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, on April 5, President Reagan made a striking departure from his 1984 campaign promise never to cut Social Security benefits. Ever since his reelection, his rhetoric on any reduction of Social Security has substantially softened.

I wish to remind the President of the promise he made during the Presidential debate in Louisville on October 7, 1984:

With regard to Social Security. . . . I will say this: A President should never say never. But I am going to violate that rule and say "never." I will never stand for a reduction of the Social Security benefits to the people that are now getting them.

Not only has he violated that rule, but he also violated the trust of millions of this Nation's elderly who believed him. For despite his continuous promises during the past year never to reduce Social Security, he and Senate Republicans have advanced a joint proposal to do just that. The compromise budget they proposed last week, will reduce the Social Security cost-of-living adjustment [COLA] by 2 percent in each of the next 3 years. In effect, this will reduce Social Security benefit payments of $22.6 billion over the next 3-year period.

After the election, when his stand on Social Security began to soften somewhat, President Reagan said that he would only consider a reduction in Social Security benefits if an overwhelming bipartisan majority of both Houses of Congress proposed it. But the impetus did not come from a bipartisan majority, instead it came from the President himself. President Reagan vehemently denies that constricting Social Security COLA's is a reduction in Social Security benefits, so much so that the President charged that anyone who said that he was breaking his promises is "lying in their teeth." Well I ask you, Mr. President, who is lying through whose teeth?

The fact of the matter is that constricting Social Security COLA's as the President and Senate Republicans are proposing is a true reduction in existing Social Security benefits. Congress determined in 1972 that the value of Social Security benefits should be held constant in the future, and wrote into law a guarantee that benefits would be increased to offset inflation. Any restriction on this periodic adjustment constitutes a reduction in currently guaranteed benefits to current Social Security recipients.

Perhaps the President should be reminded of the purpose of the Social Security program. Upon signing into law the landmark Social Security Act of 1935, President Franklin D. Roosevelt explained that the Social Security Program was intended to "give some measure of protection . . . against poverty-ridden old age." This year marks Social Security's 50th anniversary, and for all intents and purposes, this program has achieved its stated goal. It has made a tremendous contribution to the ability of older persons to survive with dignity and a measure of hope by providing some economic security, access to basic health care, and access to needed social services.

Yet, the fact remains that millions of older citizens continue to suffer because their incomes are inadequate, their health needs are unmet, and they are isolated and unable to participate in the mainstream of the Nation's daily life.

The Congressional Budget Office, which analyzed the projected financial impact on beneficiaries of the Reagan administration's new proposal, concluded that, using the administration's inflation assumption, the proposed 3-year reduction in COLAs would increase the "poverty gap" by an estimated $430 million and would increase the number of poor people by about 530,000—370,000 of them elderly.

The new Reagan/Republican proposal would reduce Social Security benefits by 1.9 percent in fiscal year 1986 and 5.7 percent in fiscal year 1988, compared to the benefits that would be received under the current law. This reduction would cost the average recipient $81 in fiscal year 1986, $198 in fiscal year 1987, and $314 in fiscal year 1988, according to an analysis by the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities.

By the time the 3-year COLA reduction specified by the new budget compromise is fully phased in, it would cost beneficiaries almost 50 percent more than the 1-year COLA freeze originally approved by the Senate Budget Committee. By fiscal year 1988, the 1-year COLA freeze would reduce benefits 3.9 percent below the levels mandated by current law, compared to 5.7 percent benefit cut under the new Republican plan. I ask you, Mr. President, is it fair to ask our Nation's poor and elderly to once again become the sacrificial lamb, while we continue to increase the military spending to astronomical proportions?

Although Social Security taxes are counted as Federal revenues, and its benefits as spending, if Social Security spending were reduced, we could not take that money saved and use it to fund some other program in the deficit. Today, the Social Security fund is strong and healthy, and accumulating surpluses into the next century. We should not tamper with the system now that we are beginning to regain the public's confidence in the Social Security Program.

Social Security is—as it always has been and as it was intended to be—an essential foundation of economic security for the elderly. Without it, millions more of the Nation's aged would live below the poverty line, and millions more who are poor would be poorer. Therefore, I urge the President to remember his promise of October 7, 1984. And I urge my colleagues to resist any further reductions in those Federal programs which reflect America's commitment to the well-being of our elderly.●

SATELLITE TELEVISION VIEWING RIGHTS

HON. W.J. (BILLY) TAUZIN

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. TAUZIN. Mr. Speaker, on March 28, along with my colleagues Mr. ROSE, Mr. WHITTAKER and Mr. MCEWEN, I introduced H.R. 1840, the Satellite Television Viewing Rights Act of 1985. We introduced this legislation in light of the tremendous growth in home satellite Earth stations which give consumers the ability to receive otherwise unavailable television programming. The proposal would require that these consumers, now over 1 million strong, be allowed access to satellite delivered television signals at reasonable rates, terms and conditions.

My concern at the time I introduced the legislation was that the cable television and other services transmitted over domestic communications satellites would be encripted—scrambled—in such a way as to effectively deny their use by home Earth station owners. It is now my understanding that efforts are underway amongst cable television networks to offer their services to home Earth station owners. That is good and I am glad to see that they have apparently decided not to disenfranchise the backyard market.

What worries me, however, are the reports that a few of these networks are banning together and agreeing among themselves to license their product exclusively to themselves and not to others who may also wish to market a competitive package to consumers. That is not the kind of free and open access to the signals which my cosponsors and I envisioned when we introduced H.R. 1840. In fact it is amazingly similar to the Premiere case which the Justice Department, cable networks, and cable operators fought only a few years back and which the court found to be in restraint of trade.

As I said on March 28, the key "is access to these signals at reasonable prices, terms and conditions." Where there is only one supplier to the market and he also happens to own the network there is, by definition, no such thing as reasonable prices, terms, and conditions. Indeed, what exists in its place is what the economists call "monopoly rent."

Mr. Speaker, the goal that the sponsors of H.R. 1840 seek is an open, competitive environment for backyard Earth station owners in which no regulation will be necessary. Absent that competition the Government must intervene just as it did in the Premiere case. I'm convinced that the satellite networks, having received the message that they cannot deny their product to consumers, are now planning to make it available in a very limited manner which suits their purposes but which does not encourage a free and open marketplace and thus does not benefit consumers. If such is the case then the kind of action envisioned in H.R. 1840 will become even more necessary.●

WHY THE PRESIDENT SHOULD CANCEL HIS VISIT TO THE BITBURG CEMETERY

HON. NORMAN Y. MINETA

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. MINETA. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to discuss the current controversy over President Reagan's planned visit to the German military cemetery of Bitburg where Nazi soldiers including some from the SS unit are buried.

Apparently, the original intent for laying the wreath at Bitburg was to symbolize the spirit of reconciliation that President Reagan in his visit to West Germany wants to stress. But let us stop for a moment and ask: "What are we reconciling ourselves with?" Are we making peace with the legacy of Hilter's Nazi forces and the atrocities that they committed?

When Hitler came to power and began his aggression against the countries of Europe, he had in his mind supreme victory and a new order for the world. He envisaged an order in which those that he considered racially superior would rule and those that he considered racially inferior would perish. Hitler's new order wiped out religion, it wiped out free speech, free thought, almost every kind of freedom that we Americans know and enjoy. If the Allied forces had not won the war, Europe and many other nations of this world would have been enveloped in a nightmare under a racist militaristic political order that they might never have escaped. The concentration camps in which 6 million Jews and millions others died stands today as testimony to this evil.

Make peace with that kind of legacy, Mr. Speaker? I think not.

Let me make clear that we know that the sins of the last generation of Germans must not be held against the new generation of Germans. Those of us that protest the visit to Bitburg are not accusing the present Germany of atrocities that were committed by Hitler. A Presidential visit to a concentration camp will not signify accusation, but simply acceptance of history as it really was.

But I am wary of what a Presidential visit to Bitburg would achieve or what it will come to symbolize. At the very least, it may symbolize making peace with the Nazi legacy, which would be unacceptable, and at the worst, it could symbolize some sort of absolution for Nazi war criminals, which would be unspeakable.

At the end of World War II, I believe we made a promise not only to those who died a brutal death in the concentration camps, but also to posterity, indeed, to humanity. Never again, we promised, never again will we let such a Holocaust take place. We promised that we would never forget the atrocities of Hitler, lest the world repeat such horror again. If President Reagan goes to Bitburg, we will be on the road to breaking that promise. We would be signifying that we are willing to forget and forgive acts that cannot ever be forgotten or forgiven.

I understand the President's desire to move forward and celebrate with the democratic Government of West Germany the joint pursuit of peace, cooperation, justice, and freedom. Let us move forward, but let us not forget the tragedy, let us not concede the horror in our haste to move on. Let us not reject the memories of those innocent millions who were brutally put to death in concentration camps.

I do not think the German people have forgotten this. I do not think the Jews have forgotten. I do not think those who fought in World War II have forgotten. I do not think the world has forgotten. I certainly do not think the President of our country should act as if he has forgotten. I ask the President to cancel his visit to Bitburg and find a more suitable way to commemorate the end of World War II and the friendship between West Germany and our country.●

WORLD WAR I SERVICE PENSIONS LONG OVERDUE

HON. C.W. BILL YOUNG

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Mr. Speaker, this is my eighth term as a Member of the U.S. House of Representatives and this is the eighth time I have sponsored legislation to provide a long overdue service pension to veterans of World War I.

When I first introduced this legislation in 1971, there were more than 1.4 million World War I veterans living in the United States. Today there are fewer than 225,000. On the average, these surviving veterans are over 80 years of age.

As the oldest American veterans, these brave men, and women, and their spouses have special needs that a $150 per month service pension will just begin to offset. I am well aware of the hardships they have incurred over the years because more than 21,000 live in Florida and 3,650 in Pinellas County, which I represent.

Our Nation has established a proud tradition of caring for those Americans who placed their lives on the line and endured great risks to preserve our sacred liberty and freedom. Congress enacted legislation to provide a service pension for every veteran from the Revolutionary War through the Spanish-American War. For all those who have served since World War II, Congress established programs providing comprehensive medical and educational benefits that are a model for other nations. The veterans of World War I unfortunately, were lost in the transition and have never been adequately rewarded for their service. Now, almost 70 years later, they are looking to us in their time of need.

H.R. 1918, the World War I Service Pension Act of 1985, which I have cosponsored, would provide a $150 per month pension to veterans of World War I and a $100 pension for their surviving spouses. These benefits are of the same level of those accorded the veterans of every other major war.

Time is quickly running out if we are to reward those Americans who bravely served our Nation many years ago. I'm hopeful that we can finally enact legislation this year to provide the much deserved benefits to these veterans who we sadly have neglected over the years.

Throughout the past 15 years, I have worked for and pledged my continued support to fully compensate all American veterans for their service in defense of our great Nation. The time is upon us to fulfill our obligation to the oldest of our veterans who served in World War I.●

THE 50TH ANNIVERSARY OF SOIL CONSERVATION SERVICE

HON. STENY H. HOYER

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. HOYER. Mr. Speaker, April 27 marks the 50th anniversary of the enactment of the first permanent legislation authorizing soil and water conservation programs in the U.S. Department of Agriculture. When the Congress passed this legislation in 1935, a commitment was made by this Nation to protect and preserve our country's soil and water resources so that we would never again witness a situation as severe as the Dust Bowl that struck our American heartland in the early 1930's.

Throughout these 50 years, the Soil Conservation Service and its dedicated employees have been at the forefront of developing and carrying out national soil and water conservation programs with farmers, environmentalists, land users, and developers. Their programs are carried on through technical help to locally organized and operated conservation districts. About 3,000 conservation districts cover more than 2 billion acres in the 50 States and territories.

Specifically, Mr. Speaker, in my own State of Maryland, USDA's Soil Conservation Service works through 24 soil conservation districts. In Maryland, SCS has provided technical help to 7,250 individuals and groups and land users have benefited from SCS conservation planning assistance covering 97,100 acres.

Most importantly, the SCS program in our State has become the keystone in the expanding pollution control efforts aimed at keeping soil erosion to a minimum flow into the Chesapeake Bay and its tributaries. Our efforts to curb runoff requires expert technical staff, which we in the State of Maryland are fortunate to have working for us through SCS.

However, Mr. Speaker, the budget request proposed by the administration seeks to cut SCS funding by approximately two-thirds by 1987. This funding level would effectively dismantle this organization which has served our Nation so ably over the past half century. In addition, the employees who have worked so diligently in preserving our Nation's most precious resources—soil and water—will be forced into early retirement.

We all are cognizant of our Nation's budget crunch. However, the attempts by the administration to dismantle the Soil Conservation Service should not be allowed to occur. I would urge my colleagues to scrutinize carefully the attempts to damage an agency that is so vitally important to our Nation's agricultural and environmental well-being.

Finally, I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate the outstanding job of the SCS employees in the State of Maryland as they join in the 50th anniversary of their agency. I hope we will assure that the SCS will enjoy another 50 years of success.●

PHILADELPHIAN NAMED INVENTOR OF THE YEAR

HON. THOMAS M. FOGLIETTA

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. FOGLIETTA. Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw the attention of the House to an award presented April 17 to a distinguished doctor from a distinguished medical school in Philadelphia.

The award is the Inventor of the Year, and the recipient is Dr. Jewell L. Osterholm, chairman of the department of neurosurgery of Jefferson Medical College, Thomas Jefferson University in the heart of Philadelphia.

The award is made by a nonprofit association called Intellectual Property Owners, Inc. [IPO], which represents people with patents, trademarks, and copyrights. IPO makes such an award every year to honor the spirit of invention that is part and parcel of the spirit of American enterprise.

This year's recipient, Dr. Osterholm, holds nine U.S. patents on a system for the treatment of stroke, specifically infarction strokes, one of two broad classes that together rank as the third leading cause of death in the United States and other industrialized nations.

The invention consists of circulating an artificial spinal fluid around the cells of the brain, a process that has been described as "a cerebral version of kidney dialysis."

Animal studies have shown that a 24-hour circulation of this fluid through the natural pathways around the brain cells has allowed full recovery of the animals. Human clinical trials are expected to begin with a year and a half. Commercial medical use is not expected before 1990, at the earliest.

I am delighted that such a person as Jewell Osterholm devotes a substantial portion of his life to seeking a treatment for such a debilitating condition as stroke. Further, I am delighted that he is doing his work at such a splendid institution at Thomas Jefferson University. Finally, I am delighted that such an organization as IPO is willing to honor such enterprise and to help focus public attention on the importance of inventors and the patent system that seeks to protect and encourage them. Thank you.●

JOHN TEDORSKI, OUTSTANDING CITIZEN

HON. JOSEPH M. GAYDOS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. GAYDOS. Mr. Speaker, on Sunday, May 5, the chamber of commerce in the city of Arnold, PA, once again will single out for community recognition several citizens who have been selected for public recognition because of their service to the municipality.

They will be honored at a testimonial dinner in the IAES Hall and presented meritorious achievement awards for their work on behalf of the community and its residents.

This year's principal honoree is Mr. John Tedorski, retiring president of the chamber. He is to be cited not only for his efforts as president of the organization during the past year but also for his work in other community activities. For example, he has been an active member of Citizens Volunteer Engine Company No. 2, serving several years as fire chief, and has served in various capacities on the Arnold Zoning Board, where he currently sits as chairman.

The chamber also will present awards to four other citizens in recognition of their accomplishments in their chosen fields. These include:

Outstanding Business Person Award—Mrs. Kathy DeSimone of the Country Counter.

Outstanding Merchant of the Year—Sam Lombardo, Sr., of the City Bottling Co.—Sam's Pop Shop. Mr. Lombardo is carrying on a business operated by his father, Nunzio Lombardo.

Outstanding Professional Achievement Award in Journalism—Mr. Paul Hess, executive editor of the Valley News Dispatch.

Outstanding Professional Achievement Award in Music—Mr. Art DeSimone.

Mr. Speaker, the annual chamber of commerce awards dinner is one of the highlights of the year for the citizens of Arnold. They turn out en masse to acknowledge those among them who give freely of their time and talent to improve their community and much of the credit for the success of this annual affair is due to the efforts of Mr. Domenic A. Saulle, secretary of the chamber and chairman of the testimonial dinner committee.

On behalf of my colleagues in the Congress of the United States, I offer our congratulations to this year's recipients of the city of Arnold Outstanding Citizenship Award.●

125TH ANNIVERSARY OF AUGUSTANA COLLEGE

HON. LANE EVANS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. EVANS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, 1985 marks the 125th anniversary of Augustana College, a well recognized liberal arts institution located in Rock Island, IL. Despite its relatively small enrollment, Augustana is well represented in Congress with two alumni: Congressman DON SUNDQUIST of Tennessee, class of 1957, and myself, class of 1974. Augustana is also well represented in the Quad City community with numerous civic leaders claiming Augustana as their alma mater.

In the year 1860, the first campus of Augustana was founded on the near north side of Chicago by Swedish immigrants who were graduates of the Old World universities of Uppsala and Lund. The graduates wanted to provide leaders for the new churches being organized, and to offer an education to the youth of the new Swedish communities.

After the devastating effects of the Civil War, which drastically reduced the number of enrolled students and faculty, Augustana College moved to Paxton, IL, in 1863. By the year 1875, the campus was located in Rock Island, IL, where it has been for more than 100 years. Today, the campus consists of more than 100 acres and 30 buildings, located on the rolling hillsides of the Mississippi River Valley.

Augustana College is highly regarded as one of the finest higher education institutions located in the Midwest. The college has been accredited by the North Central Association of Colleges & Schools since the founding of the association in 1913. Noted for its high academic standing, 80 percent of the faculty of Augustana hold doctorates or terminal degrees. Many professional and scholarly societies, such as Phi Beta Kappa and Mortar Board, are affiliated with Augustana. Along with the high academic standards of the college, Augustan's athetic department has produced a great football team, which for the last 2 years has been the national champions of the NCAA division 3, and fielded comptitive teams in track and field, baseball, and several other sports.

Augustana offers a liberal arts education, patterned to stimulate creative leadership in society. The curriculum encourages the students to make sound judgments and personal convictions that are in conjunction with moral integrity and religious values, reflecting the college's continued association with the Lutheran Church of America.

Mr. Speaker, as an alumnus of this institution it is a great honor for me to recognize the 125th anniversary of Augustana College. I congratulate Augustana, its administration, faculty, and students, for their contributions to the Quad City area, Illinois, and our Nation.●

REACHING OUT—INNOVATIVE CALIFORNIA PROGRAM ENCOURAGES FIFTH GRADERS TO ADOPT GRANDPARENTS

HON. TOM LANTOS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, adopting young children is a common phenomenon, but adopting grandparents is far less frequent. In some respects, however, it may be just as important and just as beneficial to both groups. I am delighted to report to my colleagues that adopting grandparents does happen and it is an overwhelming success.

Every week, the 31 fifth graders in Jon Geil's class at the Mary A. Deterding School in Carmichael, CA, invade the hearts of the residents of El Camino Convalescent Hospital. Every week the lives of 62 seniors are enriched.

With the help and support of the children's parents and the hospital administration, children are matched by personality and interests with an older individual at the hospital. The children carefully prepare for their hospital experience and visit, once a week, their special friends. Each child and older person have some time together alone.

Back in their school environment, the children talk, write, or draw to express their feelings—sometimes very strong ones—about the experiences they share with their older friends. They then learn the immediacy and power of the written word, art, and verbal expression to represent human experience.

Jim Cook, the administrator of the El Camino Convalescent Hospital, expressed the impact of this program on the elderly patients: "Our lives have been enriched immeasurably. Indifference has become involvement; withdrawal has become alertness; anxiety has become anticipation; isolation has become friendship; and friendship has become love." Jon Giel's fifth grade, according to the residents of the Hospital, "is our unanimous choice for the Best Thing That Ever Happened To Us."

School officials were equally enthusiastic. Fred Stewart, superintendent of the San Juan Unified School District, called the program "a truly inspirational intergenerational experience" which exemplifies and communicates "the value and benefit of the young and old being together in our society." Children have been given the opportunity to view aging from a broader perspective, interact with other age groups, improve their communication skills, and acquire leadership abilities.

Mr. Speaker, this innovative program should not be unique. There are important educational and social benefits for young and old. I commend it to my colleagues. The more we can do to strengthen links between generations, the stronger our American families will be.

There is a bond between old and young people—even old and young people who are not part of the same family—and these Carmichael fifth graders are experiencing that special relationship. Together, across the generations, thay can share profound and meaningful experiences.●

COURT OF INTERNATIONAL TRADE

HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing today a measure dealing with the Court of International Trade that makes certain minor changes to the law to be consistent with the article III status of the Court of International Trade. Prior to the enactment by Congress of the Customs Courts Act of 1980, the Court of International Trade was called the U.S. Customs Court. The Customs Courts Act of 1980 expanded the jurisdiction of the court, and provided it with all the necessary remedial powers in law and equity possessed by other Federal courts established under article III of the Constitution. The name of the court was changed to the Court of International Trade to reflect its clarified and expanded jurisdiction and its new judicial functions related to international trade.

The Customs Courts Act of 1980 meant to make the Court of International Trade similar to the other article III courts. However, the Court of International Trade does not currently have statutory authorization to hold its own judicial conference, despite the fact that other article III courts do have this authorization. An annual judicial conference is of great value as it provides a forum for the Court of International Trade to consider, with the assistance of practitioners before it, improvements in the administration of justice by the court.

The Court of International Trade is also the only article III court that is not a member of the Judicial Conference of the United States, the administrative governing body of the Federal judiciary. Despite not being a member of the Judicial Conference of the United States, however, the Court of International Trade is still subject to the policies of this Judicial Conference.

The bill I am introducing will correct the discrepancies described above. It gives the Court of International Trade the authority to hold an annual judicial conference, and makes the Court of International Trade a member of the Judicial Conference of the United States.

One more change to existing law is made by my bill. When the Court of International Trade holds court sessions across the country, other than in its home areas of the southern and eastern districts of New York, the law provides for the U.S. marshal of the district where the court holds session to act as the marshal of the court. When the court sits in the southern and eastern districts of New York, however, paradoxically it does not have statutory authority to obtain the services of a U.S. marshal when necessary. My bill corrects this to permit the U.S. marshals for the southern and eastern districts of New York to act as marshals of the Court of International Trade when the court sits in these districts.●

REMEMBERING KATE SMITH

HON. STAN LUNDINE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. LUNDINE. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor a great American, a woman who has personified patriotism for millions of Americans. May 1, 1985 will be Kate Smith's 77th birthday. The town of Bath, NY, in my district will be honoring Miss Smith on that day, and I think that it is appropriate that we in Congress take a moment to wish this wonderful lady a happy birthday.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, Kate Smith is most famous for singing "God Bless America," which served as an inspiration to millions of Americans and American troops during World War II. Miss Smith first sang this song on Armistice Day, 1938. It became an immediate success, earning her $800,000 in the midst of the Great Depression. Kate Smith donated all of this money to charity. Miss Smith's rendition of this song became so popular that she became identified with the song and the patriotism it represents. When President Franklin Roosevelt introduced Kate Smith to King George VI and Queen Elizabeth of Great Britain, in 1939 he said, "Your majesties, this is Kate Smith. This is America."

During World War II, Kate Smith was tireless in her work for the war effort. She traveled thousands of miles to entertain troops. She singlehandedly sold millions of dollars worth of war bonds.

Through the years, Kate Smith has entertained and inspired millions throughout the world. Although she is now living in retirement in Virginia, she has not been forgotten by her many, many fans. The people of Bath, NY, remember Kate Smith, and are planning a gala salute to her on her birthday. Mayor Warren Hopkins and Mr. William Kastner, director of Steuben County Veterans' Service Agency, have planned a wonderful celebration. Kate Smith's music will be piped into residents' rooms at the Bath VA Medical Center, and the village of Bath has issued a proclamation in Miss Smith's honor. I am pleased that Bath has chosen to remember Kate Smith on her 77th birthday. She truly is an American institution.

I'd like to take this opportunity to thank the village of Bath for honoring Kate Smith, and to add the best wishes of the U.S. Congress for a happy 77th birthday.●

CLINTONVILLE WOMAN'S CLUB—20TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. CHALMERS P. WYLIE

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Speaker, may I extend congratulations to the Clintonville Woman's Club on the occasion of the 20th anniversary of the completion of its clubhouse building. A dinner is being planned this evening for members of the Clintonville Woman's Club and civic leaders to celebrate the opening of this magnificent structure which has served as a meeting place for so many people interested in service to our community.

The objectives of this club shall be to encourage wholesome community life, to promote acquaintance among women of varied interests and to secure cooperation in social, educational, civic and welfare work in Clintonville. Mrs. Avanelle Hollingsworth, chairman of the board, and Mrs. Margaret Carlisle, president of the Clintonville Woman's Club, are to be commended for carrying on the wonderful work and proud reputation of this club which was organized 46 years ago this year.●

BOMBING OF THE NORTH ATLANTIC ASSEMBLY HEADQUARTERS BUILDING

HON. DANTE B. FASCELL

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday, April 20, just prior to 6 o'clock in the morning, a bomb was detonated at the rear of the headquarters building at the North Atlantic Assembly. There were no casualties but damage to the building was substantial.

After the explosion, a group calling itself the Proletarian Revolutionary Action Front contacted Belgian news and television services to claim responsibility for the bombing. It is the first reported incident involving the group. In this connection, I want to advise Members that, during the Plenary Session of the North Atlantic Assembly in Brussels, there was a threat to bomb the Assembly building which was not carried out.

Sir Patrick Wall, the president of the North Atlantic Assembly, is in Brussels, and has been meeting with Belgian Ministers of Foreign Affairs and the Interior in connection with the incident.

Mr. Speaker, I want to condemn in the strongest terms this attack. The North Atlantic Assembly is the principal parliamentary body in which

North American and European Parliamentarians meet to try to bring about a peaceful, stable, and prosperous world. The Assembly has been a powerful voice for peaceful dialog and cooperation for almost 30 years. It is a tragedy that an organization devoted to human rights and the protection of our free institutions should be subject to such mindless violence.●

RECOGNITION OF LOUIS F. BANTLE

HON. STEWART B. McKINNEY

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. McKINNEY. Mr. Speaker, today I want to make my colleagues aware of the praiseworthy activities of a constituent of mine who has worked tirelessly, over many years, in the area of alcoholism and drug abuse.

Louis F. Bantle, chairman and president of the U.S. Tobacco Co., has been closely engaged in the fight against chemical dependence. He has not simply lent his name, but rather made a personal commitment to help win this battle.

Lou's work with a wide variety of charitable and humanitarian causes is well known. Yet he has made a special contribution in the area of alcohol and drug abuse. As we in Congress know all too well, governmental efforts to combat this problem has met with only partial success. While we continue to look for new policy initiatives, individual citizens like Lou Bantle are fighting on the front lines; helping in an immediate, palpable way, the people who are hardest hit by this national epidemic.

Lou recognized the need in this area long before it began to garner the attention it demands today. He served as a member of the Connecticut Alcohol and Drug Abuse Commission and on the Governor's task force on drunk driving, and was chairman of the Alcoholism Council of Southwestern Connecticut. He is also a member of the board of directors at Ashley, an alcohol rehabilitation center in Maryland.

In addition to this direct participation, Lou has generously assisted the drug abuse prevention and alcoholism rehabilitation programs of a long list of prestigious and effective organizations, including: the Alcoholism Council, American Cancer Society, Cancer Research Institute, Family Drug Prevention Programs, Inc., Sloan Kettering Cancer Center, Meridian House Foundation, National Cancer Foundation, Pharmacists Against Drug Addiction, Remove Intoxicated Drivers, National Federation of Parents for a Drug-Free Youth, Ashley, Inc., Greenwich Advisory Council on Youth & Drugs, Greenwich Hotline, Inc., Greenwich Safe Rides and the Panel on Drug Abuse.

As government funding has become more and more scarce, Lou Bantle has used his position and his personal resources to help these organizations to continue their work. As government calls for more and more from the private sector, individuals like Lou have redoubled their personal efforts.

In recognition of his sustained contributions, Lou has received the National Human Relations Award from the National Conference of Christians and Jews and the Harden Goldstein Memorial Award for Community Service from the National Associatiion of Tobacco Distributors. In 1980 he was honored with the Governor's Award from the Connecticut Alcohol and Drug Abuse Commission.

I want to thank Lou for all of his good work and ask that he keep it up. It is fitting that the Members of this House be made aware of the level of personal involvement and commitment being demonstrated by concerned and responsible corporate leaders like Lou Bantle.●

HONORING JOHN W. PATTON

HON. NEAL SMITH

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to honor John W. Patton of Independence, IA, who is observing his 80th birthday on April 27, 1985.

Mr. Patton has had a long and distinguished record of public service, having served in the Iowa State Senate from 1965-69 and in the Iowa House from 1971-73. He also was a member of the Iowa Commission on Aging, as well as being a member of the Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Service. In addition, he was for 20 years a rural electrification co-operative director of the Buchanan County Rural Electric Co-operative and also served as president of that organization.

A lifelong farmer in Buchanan County, Mr. Patton recently retired with his wife, Alma Elizabeth, to their home in Independence, IA. Mr. Patton is still active in community affairs serving on senior citizen boards, both local and statewide. He also continues his active role in the Democratic Party.

Mr. Patton's community and public service has been a trademark of his entire life.●

THE 350TH ANNIVERSARY OF BOSTON LATIN SCHOOL

HON. JOE MOAKLEY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. MOAKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to announce the anniversary of a very special institution in the city of Boston. April 23, 1985 marks the 350th birthday of the Boston Latin School, the oldest public school in the United States of America.

The Latin School was founded by the town of Boston and has been in continuous existence since 1635. Its founders shared the belief of the ancient Greeks that the only good things in life are good of the soul. From its earliest origins, the Latin School has taught its scholars dissent with responsibility and has encouraged that climate. Today, the Latin School espouses a curriculum that is centered in the humanities to over 2,300 full-time students. Without a doubt, this institution stands for all that is valued in our educational system as it continues to equip Boston area youths with the knowledge necessary to make a positive contribution to our society.

In recognition of the 350th anniversary of the Boston Latin School, the U.S. Postal Service is unveiling a commemorative stamp celebrating the public school education this Friday, April 26, 1985, at the Boston Latin School. Fully 165 million of these stamps will be issued, sending a reminder of the contribution of public education into homes and businesses in this country and throughout the world.

As a Member of Congress from the city of Boston, I am proud to offer my congratulations to the Boston Latin School on this happy anniversary, and to wish her continued distinction and success in the future.●

TRIBUTE TO GEN. JEROME F. O'MALLEY

HON. HERBERT H. BATEMAN

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. BATEMAN. Mr. Speaker, my Sunday morning (April 21) newspaper brought me the shocking news of the death of an outstanding American and his wife in the crash of a U.S. Air Force plane at the Wilkes-Barre-Scranton, PA, airport. I have reference to Gen. Jerome F. O'Malley and his wife, Diane.

General O'Malley was the commanding general of the Tactical Air Command, headquartered at Langley Air Force Base in my district. It was my pleasure to know General O'Malley, and like all who knew him, I liked and respected him. Jerry O'Malley was an outstanding leader and possessed a very keen and well-informed mind. He had through the years before, and since becoming its commanding general, made significant contributions to the Tactical Air Command, building on the tremendous record of his predecessor, Gen. Wilbur Creech. How sad it is, the realization of his full potential of service to our country has been denied us.

When I last talked with General O'Malley, he spoke with pride and enthusiasm at being asked to serve as the principal speaker at a Boy Scout dinner honoring our colleague, Congressman JOSEPH MCDADE. There was a strong bond of friendship between Congressman MCDADE and General O'Malley, and I know how acutely our colleague feels this tragic loss.

On behalf of all my constituents and in keeping with the sense of loss felt by the Tactical Air Command and on behalf of all the men and women of the U.S. Air Force, I express profound sorrow and sincere condolences to the children and all the family of Jerry and Diane O'Malley.●

GOV. BILL DANIEL: 1985 LAWYER OF THE YEAR

HON. JACK FIELDS

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, Gov. Bill Daniel has recently been named "1985 Lawyer of the Year" by Baylor University. This is a fitting tribute to a rare and beloved man who has become a living Texas legend.

Governor Bill's ancestors helped fight for Texas' independence. Indeed, his Plantation Ranch is the oldest permanent Anglo settlement in Texas, founded in 1818 when Spain still ruled the territory. The ranges of this expansive ranch have been visited by Texas heros such as Sam Houston, William Travis, Jim Bowie, David Crockett, and Jean LaFitte.

It has been accurately written that Bill Daniel is a man who has crowded three or four lifetimes into just 67 years. Perhaps the same can be said for other men and women, but what sets Bill Daniel apart from others is that his crowded life has been filled with extraordinary service to others.

Mr. Speaker, the compassionate character of Bill Daniel is reflected in the fact that for almost four decades Plantation Ranch has been the hub of hundreds of philanthropic, educational, agricultural, and recreational programs for groups and individuals from around the globe. Such activities include the world's largest Easter egg hunts, crippled children's parties, Boy Scout jamborees, as well as numerous church, civic and historical functions.

Governor Bill's life of service is also reflected in his long commitment and labors in behalf of his beloved Baylor University. His affection for Baylor has been continual and concrete. He has given 45 years of his life enhancing a scholarship trust left to the university by his father, greatly increasing its value and importance. In addition he has provided numerous scholarships and gifts to Baylor on his own. However, it is his heart that has so endeared him to the university; he has served selflessly since his early days as a student.

Mr. Speaker, one could go on for hours about the life and service of Bill Daniel; both private and public service are his hallmarks. Suffice it to say that I also raise my voice in the loud chorus of those celebrating the past, present and future life of a man who successfully dared to be as big as Texas itself.●

ELEANOR R. LANTRY AND ANNE WHITMAN: TWO VERY SPECIAL VOLUNTEERS

HON. BILL LOWERY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. LOWERY of California. Mr. Speaker, this week is National Hospital Volunteer Week and we are commending the thousands of people who have given their time to benefit those in need.

As with all human endeavors, there are those who rise above and set an example for all others to follow. I rise to call the attention of this Congress to two such individuals in San Diego who have performed, year in and year out, an exemplary service.

Eleanor R. Lantry and Anne Whitman are volunteers at Mercy Hospital. Both have contributed more than 20,000 hours each to the patients and families who found themselves at the hospital.

Mrs. Lantry began her service in 1962 after retiring as executive secretary to the president of Convair. She and Anne Whitman have worked in the gift shop and refused to be paid for what is to them a labor of love.

These two women symbolize the best of the volunteer spirit. They also symbolize what makes our Nation great: Those who give, without expectations for payment, because helping the less fortunate or the infirm is payment enough.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure I speak for all my colleagues in commending Eleanor R. Lantry and Anne Whitman for their tireless efforts and undying devotion. Mercy Hospital is the immediate beneficiary of their work, but we, as a nation, prosper immeasurably from their charitable spirit.●

A TRIBUTE TO FATHER LEO J. KINSELLA

HON. WILLIAM O. LIPINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. LIPINSKI. Mr. Speaker, it is with great pride that I rise today to call attention to Father Leo J. Kinsella who will be celebrating the 50th anniversary of his ordination into the priesthood on April 28, 1985.

Father Kinsella has had a long and distinguished career in the priesthood. He was ordained on April 28, 1935, at St. Mary of the Lake Seminary in Mundelin, IL. During his first assignment to the Immaculate Conception Parish in Elmhurst, IL, Father Kinsella was instrumental in building a new high school and, in addition, served there as a teacher and athletic coach. Father Kinsella enlisted as an Air Force Chaplain during World War II and rendered spiritual service, solace, encouragement and advice to innumerable Air Force personnel under wartime conditions in France and Germany. In July 1959, the Father was appointed Pastor of Our Lady of the Snows Parish on the southwest side of Chicago. He served there for the next 20 years, earning the love and respect of the entire community for his faithful work.

I join with the residents of the Fifth Congressional District in paying tribute to Father Kinsella on the occasion of his 50th anniversary and thank him for his outstanding community work in our behalf.●

A TRIBUTE TO MARK LEVINE, FORMER STAFF DIRECTOR FOR SMALL BUSINESS SUBCOMMITTEE ON GENERAL OVERSIGHT AND THE ECONOMY

HON. BERKLEY BEDELL

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Speaker, I was privileged in the past 5½ years to work with a very capable and dedicated staff member, Mark Levine.

Mark worked with me when I was chairman of the Small Business Subcommittee on General Oversight and the Economy. He was instrumental in many of the accomplishments of that subcommittee, most recently, the legislation Congress passed last year to reform the Federal Government's procurement system.

Mark has ended his service to the House of Representatives to join Geo-Centers, Inc., as assistant to company President Edward Marram. Geo-Centers is a small, but growing, professional services firm specializing in high-tech research and development. The company has offices in Boston, Albuquerque, and Washington, DC. Mark will be in the Washington, DC, office.

Mr. Speaker, good staff is a valuable asset. In Mark's departure, the House has lost such an asset. I have deeply appreciated his work for me, for the Small Business Committee, for the House, and for the United States. I wish him the best in his new pursuits.●

SURPLUS VESSELS FOR HUMANITARIAN SERVICES

HON. PARREN J. MITCHELL

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation which seeks to set aside certain surplus Government-owned vessels for the use of Life International in providing health and other humanitarian services to developing countries.

For a number of years, I have been associated with Life International, a private nonprofit humanitarian organization devoted to developing a mercy fleet which would take aid, technical assistance, training and education to the people of the Third World. It has been shown that the areas in which the greatest immediate good can be accomplished are in those simple essentials of life that most of us take for granted: safe water to drink; clean places in which to live, heal, and bathe; food to eat; and basic health education. The need for professionals and technicians trained in health care far exceeds the capacity of existing institutions and programs. Life International has the people, energy and commitment to provide these essentials to those in Third World countries.

Mr. Speaker, in order for this humanitarian organization to carry out its unique and innovative plan for providing relief to the impoverished Third World countries, the Members of this body must act responsibly and with compassion to approve this legislation. No provision in this bill would require funding from the U.S. Government, only set-aside authority, which would be waived in the event the vessels are needed for national security purposes.

I am confident in Life International's ability to provide medical, education and health care services to less developed nations, and I encourage my colleagues, on both sides of the aisle, to demonstrate their commitment and support to humanitarian efforts and private sector solutions, and make this dream a reality.●

BRIGHTON SALUTES SIDNEY JONAS: 80 YEARS YOUNG

HON. STEPHEN J. SOLARZ

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. SOLARZ. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to Sidney Jonas who is celebrating his 80th birthday. Sidney is one of those men who prove time and time again that when you want to get something done, give it to a busy man who cares.

Sidney Jonas cares about people and his country. He has spent his life doing things on behalf of others, and is letting us celebrate his birthday publicly, only because it will aid one of his favorite organizations, the Brooklyn Arts and Culture Association. Because of his lifelong love of the arts, Sidney Jonas helped organize the Brooklyn Arts and Cultural Organization and has served as the cultural chairman of Community Planning Board 13. He has worked to make the arts accessible to everyone from elementary students to senior citizens.

Born in Poland in 1905, Sidney exemplifies the immigrant tradition which has so enriched our Nation and particularly our great city. A pioneer in the labor movement in New York, Sidney became director of the northeast region of the UAW of the CIO in 1937. Those were hard times for workers, and Sidney was one of those union leaders trying to keep the bosses honest while fighting for fair pay and decent working conditions for his members.

When World War II broke out, Sidney Jonas answered the call of his adopted country and served proudly in the Army. After the service, he became an active member in the Jewish War Veterans. His interests in providing for the health and welfare needs of working men and women led Sidney to become an active member of the Workman's Circle. He still serves that excellent organization as a member of its executive board.

I think the poet Yeats must have been thinking about someone like Sidney when he said: "Think where man's glory most begins and ends, and say my glory was I had such friends."

I have been privileged to know Sidney Jonas since 1966, and I am proud to say that I, too, have benefited from his generosity, his wisdom, and his understanding of people and issues. His extensive involvement with community organizations in the Brighton community has not lessened in the almost two decades that I have known this remarkable man. And many of the good things that have happened in the Brighton community in that length of time came into being because of the involvement of spirited, enthusiastic, and committed activists like Sidney Jonas.

Mr. Speaker, I know that my remarks here tonight will be echoed over and over again in Brighton Beach as the family, friends, and neighbors of this good man say "Happy Birthday Sidney. May you have another 80 years of good health and great happiness."●

UNITED NATIONS ADOPTS CONSUMER PROTECTION GUIDELINES

HON. MICHAEL D. BARNES

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased that, after several years of negotiations, the United Nations General Assembly has passed a resolution aimed at protecting consumers throughout the world. Consumer lobbyist, Esther Peterson, has said, It is the first time that there will be an international charter outlining consumer rights," and describes the document as "an enlargement of President Kennedy's consumer bill of rights." The U.N. document objectives include a healthy marketplace, physical safety, product safety and quality standards, education and information programs, fairness in the marketplace and avenues for resolution of consumer disputes.

Mr. Speaker, the text of the resolution follows:

RESOLUTION 39/248 ON CONSUMER PROTECTION

(Adopted April 9, 1985)

The General Assembly,

Recalling Economic and Social Council resolution 1981/62 of 23 July 1981, in which the Council requested the Secretary-General to continue consultations on consumer protection with a view to elaborating a set of general guidelines for consumer protection, taking particularly into account the needs of the developing countries,

Recalling further General Assembly resolution 38/147 of 19 December 1983,

Noting Economic and Social Council resolution 1984/63 of 26 July 1984,

1. Decides to adopt the guidelines for consumer protection annexed to the present resolution;

2. Requests the Secretary-General to disseminate the guidelines to Governments and other interested parties;

3. Requests all United Nations organizations that elaborate guidelines and related documents on specific areas relevant to consumer protection to distribute them to the appropriate bodies of individual States.

Annex

GUIDELINES FOR CONSUMER PROTECTION

I. Objectives

1. Taking into account the interests and needs of consumers in all countries, particularly those in developing countries; recognizing that consumers often face imbalances in economic terms, educational levels, and bargaining power; and bearing in mind that consumers should have the right of access to non-hazardous products, as well as of promoting just, equitable and sustainable economic and social development, these guidelines for consumer protection have the following objectives;

(a) To assist countries in achieving or maintaining adequate protection for their population as consumers;

(b) To facilitate production and distribution patterns responsive to the needs and desires of consumers;

(c) To encourage high levels of ethical conduct for those engaged in the production and distribution of goods and services to consumers;

(d) To assist countries in curbing abusive business practices by all enterprises at the national and international levels which adversely affect consumers;

(e) To facilitate the development of independent consumer groups;

(f) To further international co-operation in the field of consumer protection;

(g) To encourage the development of market conditions which provide consumers with greater choice at lower prices.

II. General principles

2. Governments should develop, strengthen or maintain a strong consumer; protection policy, taking into account the guidelines set out below. In so doing, each Government must set its own priorities for the protection of consumers in accordance with the economic and social circumstances of the country, and the needs of its population, and bearing in mind the costs and benefits of proposed measures.

3. The legitimate needs which the guidelines are intended to meet are the following:

(a) The protection of consumers from hazards to their health and safety;

(b) The promotion and protection of the economic interests of consumers;

(c) Access of consumers to adequate information to enable them to make informed choices according to individual wishes and needs;

(d) Consumer education;

(e) Availability of effective consumer redress;

(f) Freedom to form consumer and other relevant groups or organizations and the opportunity of such organizations to present their views in decision-making processes affecting them.

4. Governments should provide or maintain adequate infrastructure to develop, implement and monitor consumer protection polices. Special care should be taken to ensure that measures for consumer protection are implemented for the benefit of all sectors of the population, particularly the rural population.

5. All enterprises should obey the relevant laws and regulations of the countries in which they do business. They should also conform to the appropriate provisions of international standards for consumer protection to which the competent authorities of the country in question have agreed. (Hereinafter references to international standards in the guidelines should be viewed in the context of this paragraph.)

6. The potential positive role of universities and public and private enterprises in research should be considered when developing consumer protection polices.

III. Guidelines

7. The following guidelines should apply both to home-produced goods and services and to imports.

8. In applying any procedures or regulations for consumer protection, due regard should be given to ensuring that they do not become barriers to international trade and that they are consistent with international trade obligations.

A. Physical safety

9. Governments should adopt or encourage the adoption of appropriate measures, including legal systems, safety regulations, national or international standards, voluntary standards and the maintenance of safety records to ensure that products are safe for either intended or normally foreseeable use.

10. Appropriate policies should ensure that goods produced by manufacturers are safe for either intended or normally foreseeable use. Those responsible for bringing goods to the market, in particular suppliers, exporters, importers, retailers and the like (hereinafter referred to as distributors), should ensure that while in their care these goods are not rendered unsafe through improper handling or storage and that while in their care they do not become hazardous through improper handling or storage. Consumers should be instructed in the proper use of goods and should be informed of the risks involved in intended or normally foreseeable use. Vital safety information should be conveyed to consumers by internationally understandable symbols wherever possible.

11. Appropriate policies should ensure that if manufacturers or distributors become aware of unforeseen hazards after products are placed on the market, they should notify the relevant authorities and, as appropriate, the public without delay. Governments should also consider ways of ensuring that consumers are properly informed of such hazards.

12. Governments should, where appropriate, adopt policies under which, if a product is found to be seriously defective and/or to constitute a substantial and severe hazard even when properly used, manufacturers and/or distributors should recall it and replace or modify it, or substitute another product for it; if it is not possible to do this within a reasonable length of time, the consumer should be adequately compensated.

B. Promotion and protection of consumers' economic interests

13. Government policies should seek to enable consumers to obtain optimum benefit from their economic resources. They should also seek to achieve the goals of satisfactory production and performance standards, adequate distribution methods, fair business practices, informative marketing and effective protection against practices which could adversely affect the economic interests of consumers and the exercise of choice in the market-place.

14. Governments should intensify their efforts to prevent practices which are damaging to the economic interests of consumers through ensuring that manufacturers, distributors and others involved in the provision of goods and services adhere to established laws and mandatory standards. Consumer organizations should be encouraged to monitor adverse practices, such as the adulteration of foods, false or misleading claims in marketing and service frauds.

15. Governments should develop, strengthen or maintain, as the case may be, measures relating to the control of restrictive and other abusive business practices which may be harmful to consumers, including means for the enforcement of such measures. In this connection, Governments should be guided by their commitment to the Set of Multilaterally Agreed Equitable Principles and Rules for the Control of Restrictive Business Practices adopted by the General Assembly in resolution 35/63 of 5 December 1980.

16. Governments should adopt or maintain policies that make clear the responsibility of the producer to ensure that goods meet reasonable demands of durability, utility and reliability, and are suited to the purpose for which they are intended, and that the seller should see that these requirements are met. Similar policies should apply to the provision of services.

17. Governments should encourage fair and effective competition in order to provide consumers with the greatest range of choice among products and services at the lowest cost.

18. Governments should, where appropriate, see to it that manufacturers and/or retailers ensure adequate availability of reliable after-sales service and spare parts.

19. Consumers should be protected from such contractual abuses as one-sided standard contracts, exclusion of essential rights in contracts, and unconscionable conditions of credit by sellers.

20. Promotional marketing and sales practices should be guided by the principle of fair treatment of consumers and should meet legal requirements. This requires the provision of the information necessary to enable consumers to make informed and independent decisions, as well as measures to ensure that the information provided is accurate.

21. Governments should encourage all concerned to participate in the free flow of accurate information on all aspects of consumer products.

22. Governments should, within their own national context, encourage the formulation and implementation by business, in co-operation with consumer organizations, of codes of marketing and other business practices to ensure adequate consumer protection. Voluntary agreements may also be established jointly by business, consumer organizations and other interested parties. These codes should receive adequate publicity.

23. Governments should regularly review legislation pertaining to weights and measures and assess the adequacy of the machinery for its enforcement.

C. Standards for the safety and quality of consumer goods and services

24. Governments should, as appropriate, formulate or promote the elaboration and implementation of standards, voluntary and other, at the national and international levels for the safety and quality of goods and services and give them appropriate publicity. National standards and regulations for product safety and quality should be reviewed from time to time, in order to ensure that they conform, where possible, to generally accepted international standards.

25. Where a standard lower than the generally accepted international standard is being applied because of local economic conditions, every effort should be made to raise that standard as soon as possible.

26. Governments should encourage and ensure the availability of facilities to test and certify the safety, quality and performance of essential consumer goods and services.

D. Distribution facilities for essential consumer goods and services

27. Governments should, where appropriate, consider:

(a) Adopting or maintaining policies to ensure the efficient distribution of goods and services to consumers; where appropriate, specific policies should be considered to ensure the distribution of essential goods and services where this distribution is endangered, as could be the case particularly in rural areas. Such policies could include assistance for the creation of adequate storage and retail facilities in rural centres, incentives for consumer self-help and better control of the conditions under which essential goods and services are provided in rural areas;

(b) Encouraging the establishment of consumer co-operatives and related trading activities, as well as information about them, especially in rural areas.

E. Measures enabling consumers to obtain redress

28. Governments should establish or maintain legal and/or administrative measures to enable consumers or, as appropriate, relevant organizations to obtain redress through formal or informal procedures that are expeditious, fair, inexpensive and accessible. Such procedures should take particular account of the needs of low-income consumers.

29. Governments should encourage all enterprises to resolve consumer disputes in a fair, expeditious and informal manner, and to establish voluntary mechanisms, including advisory services and informal complaints procedures, which can provide assistance to consumers.

30. Information on available redress and other dispute-resolving procedures should be made available to consumers.

F. Education and information programmes

31. Governments should develop or encourage the development of general consumer education and information programmes, bearing in mind the cultural traditions of the people concerned. The aim of such programmes should be to enable people to act as discriminating consumers, capable of making an informed choice of goods and services, and conscious of their rights and responsibilities. In developing such programmes, special attention should be given to the needs of disadvantaged consumers, in both rural and urban areas, including low-income consumers and those with low or non-existent literacy levels.

32. Consumer education should, where appropriate, become an integral part of the basic curriculum of the educational system, preferably as a component of existing subjects.

33. Consumer education and information programmes should cover such important aspects of consumer protection as the following:

(a) Health, nutrition, prevention of foodborne diseases and food adulteration;

(b) Product hazards;

(c) Product labelling;

(d) Relevant legislation, how to obtain redress, and agencies and organizations for consumer protection;

(e) Information on weights and measures, prices, quality, credit conditions and availability of basic necessities; and

(f) As appropriate, pollution and environment.

34. Governments should encourage consumer organizations and other interested groups, including the media, to undertake education and information programmes, particularly for the benefit of low-income consumer groups in rural and urban areas.

35. Business should, where appropriate, undertake or participate in factual and relevant consumer education and information programmes.

36. Bearing in mind the need to reach rural consumers and illiterate consumers, Governments should, as appropriate, develop or encourage the development of consumer information programmes in the mass media.

37. Governments should organize or encourage training programmes for educators, mass media professionals and consumer advisers, to enable them to participate in carrying out consumer information and education programmes.

G. Measures relating to specific areas

38. In advancing consumer interests, particularly in developing countries, Governments should, where appropriate, give priority to areas of essential concern for the health of the consumer, such as food, water and pharmaceuticals. Policies should be adopted or maintained for product quality control, adequate and secure distribution facilities, standardized international labelling and information, as well as education and research programmes in these areas. Government guidelines in regard to specific areas should be developed in the context of the provisions of the present document.

39. Food. When formulating national policies and plans with regard to food, Governments should take into account the need of all consumers for food security and should support and, as far as possible, adopt standards from the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations and the World Health Organization Codex Alimentarius or, in their absence, other generally accepted international food standards. Governments should maintain, develop or improve food safety measures, including, inter alia, safety criteria, food standards and dietary requirements and effective monitoring, inspection and evaluation mechanisms.

40. Water. Governments should, within the goals and targets set for the International Drinking Water Supply and Sanitation Decade, formulate, maintain or strengthen national policies to improve the supply, distribution and quality of water for drinking. Due regard should be paid to the choice of appropriate levels of service, quality and technology, the need for education programmes and the importance of community participation.

41. Pharmaceuticals. Governments should develop or maintain adequate standards, provisions and appropriate regulatory systems for ensuring the quality and appropriate use of pharmaceuticals through integrated national drug policies which could address, inter alia, procurement, distribution, production, licensing arrangements, registration systems and the availability of reliable information on pharmaceuticals. In so doing, Governments should take special account of the work and recommendations of the World Health Organization on pharmaceuticals. For relevant products the use of that organization's Certification Scheme on the Quality of Pharmaceutical Products Moving in International Commerce and other international information systems on pharmaceuticals should be encouraged. Measures should also be taken, as appropriate, to promote the use of international non-proprietary names (INNs) for drugs, drawing on the work done by the World Health Organization.

42. In addition to the priority areas indicated above, Governments should adopt appropriate measures in other areas, such as pesticides and chemicals in regard, where relevant, to their use, production and storage, taking into account such relevant health and environmental information as Governments may require producers to provide and include in the labelling of products.

IV. International Co-operation

43. Governments should, especially in a regional or subregional context:

(a) Develop, review, maintain or strengthen, as appropriate, mechanisms for the exchange of information on national policies and measures in the field of consumer protection;

(b) Co-operate or encourage co-operation in the implementation of consumer protection policies to achieve greater results within existing resources. Examples of such co-operation could be collaboration in the setting up or joint use of testing facilities, common testing procedures, exchange of consumer information and education programmes, joint training programmes and joint elaboration of regulations;

(c) Co-operate to improve the conditions under which essential goods are offered to consumers, giving due regard to both price and quality. Such co-operation could include joint procurement of essential goods, exhange of information on different procurement possibilities and agreements on regional product specifications.

44. Governments should develop or strengthen information links regarding products which have been banned, withdrawn or severely restricted in order to enable other importing countries to protect themselves adequately against the harmful effects of such products.

45. Governments should work to ensure that the quality of products, and information relating to such products, does not vary from country to country in a way that would have detrimental effects on consumers.

46. Governments should work to ensure that policies and measures for consumer protection are implemented with due regard to their not becoming barriers to international trade, and that they are consistent with international trade obligations.●

WOMEN ARE PAYING MORE FOR INSURANCE

HON. JAMES J. FLORIO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, a recent article in the Philadelphia Inquirer raises some interesting points concerning sex discrimination in insurance. The article points out that women are charged $16,000 more than men pay over a lifetime for the typical forms of insurance coverage. Surprisingly this discrimination continues even in Pennsylvania where a recent State Supreme Court case held that gender-based rates violate the Pennsylvania equal rights amendment and constitute unfair discrimination.

The article suggests that a better distribution of risk could include use of an individual's accident record and mileage. A driver's accident record is usually available to insurance companies, and mileage, which is highly correlated with accident rate, could be verified through odometer checks at auto inspection or at the time of claims. Use of accident records and mileage would do away with discrimination resulting from the use of gender based classifications.

I recommend this thoughtful column to my colleagues' attention:

WOMEN ARE PAYING MORE FOR INSURANCE

(By Rita L. Bernstein)

The debate over sex discrimination in insurance persists. It persists notwithstanding the persuasive evidence that sex-based pricing is unfair; that it is not required—or even supported—by relevant statistics; and that, for example, in the case of auto insurance, sex discrimination operates to subsidize unsafe motorists, including drunken drivers.

It persists notwithstanding its substantial price tag for women who are charged $16,000 more than men pay over a lifetime for the typical forms of coverage (auto, medical, disability, life and pension). And, perhaps most frustrating, sex discrimination in insurance persists notwithstanding a decision by the Pennsylvania Supreme Court last September that insurance rates based on sex are unconstitutional.

On Sept. 27, 1984, the state Supreme Court decided the case of Hartford Accident & Indemnity Co. vs. Insurance Commission, involving auto insurance rates. The majority opinion, written by Chief Justice Robert N.C. Nix, recognized that "gender-based rates . . . rely on and perpetuate stereotypes" and, in light of the Pennsylvania Equal Rights Amendment, constitute "unfair discrimination" prohibited by the state insurance law.

A concurring opinion by Justice William Hutchinson emphasized that "the ERA objectively demonstrates, in the most forceful possible way, the feeling of the people of this state that sex discrimination is unfair."

Unfortunately, the Supreme Court's words seem to have fallen on deaf ears. Sex discrimination in insurance continues while the insurance industry publicly announces its plans to lobby for legislation designed to overturn the Supreme Court's decision.

Despite the example set by four other states, which years ago swiftly and painlessly eliminated sex as a permissible factor in auto rates, William R. Muir, acting Pennsylvania insurance commissioner, has thus far declined to implement the Supreme Court decision and has chosen instead to hold public hearings to "assist" him in following the law of the Hartford case.

Not surprisingly, the "public" that has dominated the hearings has been members of the insurance industry. It has turned out in droves, forecasting doom if it can no longer discriminate and perverting any possible legitimate basis for the hearings by using them as a forum not to implement but to resist the Supreme Court's decision.

Having lost in court, the insurance industry now makes a desperate last effort to avoid the judicial decision, an effort that was not successful in North Carolina, Massachusetts, Michigan or Hawaii, where the same industry has adjusted to unisex auto rates with no disastrous consequences for consumers and no major marketplace disruptions. Meanwhile, women in Pennsylvania are forced to pay the price of this delay.

How are women overcharged? Men above age 25 drive 30 percent more miles than do women above age 25 (12,000 vs. 9,200 miles per year) and men above age 25 have 38 percent more accidents than women above age 25 (4.4 vs. 3.2 accidents per 100 drivers per year).

In spite of their better driving records, women above age 25 are charged the same price as men above age 25 for auto insurance. In addition, men above age 25 drive 87 percent more miles than women age 16–24 (12,000 ys. 6,700 per year) and men above age 25 have 10 percent more accidents than women ages 16–24 (4.4 vs. 4.0 accidents per 100 drivers per year). Again without regard to these facts, men above age 25 pay much less for insurance than women ages 16–24.

So much for the myth perpetuated by the insurance industry that sex discrimination in auto insurance is good for women. So much, also, for the insurance industry's insistence that pricing must be, and is, "cost-based."

The obvious solution—the one consistent with the Pennsylvania ERA, the mandate of the State Supreme Court and fair distribution of risk—is to charge for insurance based on mileage, accident record and sobriety, factors that currently play only a minor role in determining a driver's rate.

Mileage, which in and of itself is highly correlated with accident rate and therefore an excellent predictor of risk, can easily be verified through such methods as odometer readings at the time of auto inspection or spot checks at the time of claims. A driver's accident record, including whether alcohol was a factor in each crash, is also available to insurance companies.

Using these causal criteria would advance the very significant public policy of discouraging and punishing drunken and other unsafe drivers. In addition, rates based on mileage would create incentives to drive less, fostering the use of car pools and public transportation. The use of gender, an immutable characteristic, in place of factors over which individuals have control and which contribute to accidents is not only unconstitutional but also reduces the incentive for safe driving.

The investment by the insurance industry in sex discrimination must not remain unchecked. Commissioner Muir, a public official charged with responsibility of regulating the insurance industry, should exercise his authority in accordance with the Pennsylvania Supreme Court's decision and the state ERA to prohibit sex-based rates immediately.●

A CONGRESSIONAL TRIBUTE TO RAY RICHETTI

HON. GLENN M. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay tribute to Raymond J. Richetti of Cypress, CA, who is retiring next month from the Long Beach Naval Shipyard.

Born and raised in San Francisco, Ray Richetti began his civil service career at Hunter's Point Naval Shipyard as an apprentice electrician in 1944. Since then, aside from a period of service in the U.S. Navy, Ray has worked at Hunter's Point Naval Shipyard, Mare Island Naval Shipyard, and the Long Beach Naval Shipyard.

In 1946, upon completing his World War II service in the Navy, Ray Richetti returned to the Hunter's Point Naval Shipyard. In his 28 years of service at Hunter's Point Naval Shipyard, he rose from an apprentice to superintendent of both the electrical and electronics group and the structural and service group.

In November of 1973, after the completion of closure operations at Hunter's Point Naval Shipyard, Ray Richetti transferred to Mare Island Naval Shipyard. He started as the production engineering officer and was promoted in July 1974 to electrical group superintendent.

In September 1974, Ray transferred to Long Beach Naval Shipyard as the group superintendent for electrical, electronics and weapon systems group; 5 years later he assumed the position of mechanical group superintendent. He is currently the executive assistant to the shipyard commander for the purpose of coordinating the reorganization of the shipyard.

Mr. Richetti's efforts as a manager and leader have been acknowledged by numerous awards and letters of commendation. His leadership qualities and ability to guide his peers have caused him to be elected president of the National Association of Superintendents' chapters at Hunter's Point, Mare Island, and Long Beach Naval Shipyards. He has received both the Federal Executive Board Outstanding Supervisor Award and the coveted Navy Civilian Meritorious Achievement Award during his service at the Long Beach Naval Shipyard. His career has also been marked by success with numerous special projects and ship overhaul completions. One of the most noteworthy, and certainly the most visible, of his success stories is the leading role he played in the reactivation of the battleship U.S.S. New Jersey (BB–62).

Ray Richetti has enriched the quality of work and the quality of life during his 41 years of service at three naval shipyards. I am sure that he will be greatly missed by his colleagues at the Long Beach Naval Shipyard, and all others who had the pleasure of working with him. My wife, Lee, joins me in wishing Raymond Richetti a happy and fulfilling retirement, and we also wish Ray and his wife Avis and their children Mike, Janice, and Nancy, and their seven grandchildren all the best in the years ahead.●

TRAFFIC LIGHT TO GO UP

HON. WILLIAM LEHMAN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. LEHMAN of Florida. Mr. Speaker, after an 8-year battle, a constituent and good friend of mine, Irving Levine, has succeeded in having a traffic light placed on a busy corner in Miami Beach. The obvious danger at the intersection prompted Mr. Levine to try to persuade the county about the need for the signal. Its installation after waiting 8 years is a triumph for the perseverance and determination of Mr. Levine and a great benefit to the citizens of that area.

I want to extend my congratulations to him and the organizations and individuals who helped him make our community a safer place.

Following is the story from the North Miami Beach Sun Reporter about Irv Levine's battle:

[From the Miami Beach Sun Reporter, Mar. 27, 1985]

TRAFFIC LIGHT WILL GO UP

(By Beth J. Feinstein)

April 23 will be a day, Irving Levine has waited eight years for.

During the early morning hours the Sunny Isles resident will be given the honor of activating a newly installed traffic light.

Once activated it will mean the end of an eight-year battle Levine has fought to have a traffic light installed at the corner of 170th Street and Collins Avenue.

"I fell like I've accomplished something to make my neighborhood safe," said Levine, after hearing the announcement at a Concerned Citizens of Northeast Dade meeting March 25.

A Concerned Citizens member and resident of Vista View Apartments, Levine said his eight-year struggle entailed a letter writing campaign and numerous appearances before the Dade County Commission.

Adding that this battle was not fought alone, Levine said he was aided by the Concerned Citizens, Sunny Isles Resort Association, Owners, Residents Association of Sunny Isles, Commissioner Harvey Ruvin and "so many influential people I can't name them all."

The newly-installed light, Levine said, will allow residents and tourists to safely cross the corner which has hotels lining its east side and the entrances to 170th Shopping Center and Vista View Apartments on its west side.

"It's a necessity," Levine said about the traffic light. "People couldn't cross the street. The traffic is so bad."●

THE BLACK FAMILY IN CRISIS

HON. CHARLES B. RANGEL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. RANGEL. Mr. Speaker, I rise to bring to the attention of my colleagues the alarming erosion of the black family, a disaster of special significance to this Nation.

Poverty in America is increasing, Mr. Speaker, because this administration has neglected its legislative and moral obligation to help the poor. Policies which were enacted to reduce welfare dependency have had a negative impact; there is a 68-percent poverty rate for children in female headed households and a 79-percent birth rate among single females under 18. These figures represent New York City alone. Mothers receiving these benefits have little incentive to work. These statistics indicate a gradual erosion of the basic foundations of the black family structure.

Poverty translates into second-class citizenship in housing, education and most importantly, in employment. While Government policies are clearly the blame, there are a number of organizations working together to remedy this compelling problem. Organizations like the National Council of Negro Women, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, and the National Urban League are, together, helping to meet the enormous challenge of saving the black family. Mr. Earl Caldwell, a reporter with the New York Daily News, is to be commended for increasing our awareness of this problem; we in the Congress must begin to take the necessary steps to make the blight of poverty—not just a national priority—a legislative priority as well. We must insure that the door to opportunity is open to the poor.

I submit the following, as evidence of this most distressing black family pattern, for inclusion in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

[From the New York Daily News, Mar. 15, 1985]

WHAT TO DO ABOUT KIDS HAVING KIDS

The words that stick in the mind are the ones that come from Dorothy Height. She hears the language that says it's a catastrophe, that the problem of "children having children" is so great it poses a threat without equal to the future of black people. She does not argue with that assessment but she looks to the other side. "This is one problem that can be solved," she says and those are the words that stick in the mind.

Among black leaders, Dorothy Height is an old hand. Hers is a perspective that spans the years. When the legendary Mary McLeod Bethune stepped down as president of the National Council of Negro Women, Dorothy Height took over and she has been there since.

She points out that teenaged parenthood itself, is not new in the black community. "Even in the forties," she says, "four out of five black women became mothers before their 20th birthdays." But the difference now, as she points out, is that the young girls having babies are not married. And as she also points out, it's not just single, teenaged black girls having babies. It's a problem that crosses racial lines.

"Most of the girls are white," Dorothy Height says but she adds that for blacks, the problem is more profound because it is happening to a disproportionate number of young girls. "When it's 55%, it's too many," she says and her figures show that in 1981, among black girls under 20, the rate of single mother births was 86%.

But the question that looms large is, what to do? When Dorothy Height looks back, she can see a long way. "So much has changed," she says. And as for the kids, she says that "The moralistic approach alone won't get it." "A concerted, multi-dimensional effort is needed," she says. "The problem must be faced by all—individuals, families, organizations, as well as churches which are the backbone of our community."

But that's not all of it. She says we have to take a hard look at the way sex is peddled nowadays. "The environment," she calls it. She says a lot depends on dealing openly with the children who are having children. "And as we do this, it will be necessary to come to grips with the confused messages sent by adults to children. The values of the children have to be examined in tandem with those of adults," she says.

And that's not all, either. She said women increasingly have become committed to solving the problem and she points to a number of organizations and programs. The other piece of that has to do with the men. "Black men must become equal partners in the struggle to protect the future of our next generation," she says.

But that, still, is not all of the answer. "As long as black youths have 50%, 60%, 70% unemployment, as long as they have nothing to look forward to, as long as they are not involved, you have the problem of getting some kind of values framework." She said that on one side young girls have babies and say, "At last I have somebody to love me" and on the other, young men proving their manhood by fathering children they do not want. And she said studies suggest that "our girls do not so much decide to have babies, as (they) fail to decide not to."

A lot of it comes back to education and work. "The first imperative for action is education and that includes enlightened school policies," she says. "And we must continue to press for job programs which include training in areas designed to meet the requirements of today's labor market."

The words that stick in the mind say that it's all a problem that can be solved. And Dorothy Height talks of many programs that already are off the ground. But she also says something else: "It is later than we think," she says and those too are words that will stick in the mind.●

LIBERAL JIBES ON THE RED MENACE

HON. JACK FIELDS

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, Dr. Harms Kaufmann, director of the Austrian Institute of European Studies in Vienna, has written: "Propaganda falls on us like mental pollution. . . ."

Columnist Dorothy Rabinowitz has recently reminded us that some unabashed propagandists thrive in the pages of our own liberal-biased newspapers. The following appeared in the April 8 Washington Times.

[From the Washington Times, Apr. 9, 1985]

LIBERAL JIBES ON THE RED MENACE

(By Dorothy Rabinowitz)

Everyone knew, following the recent unfriendly remarks about the Sandinistas by the president and the secretary of state, the retribution that would follow. Such talk can always be counted on to touch raw nerves in a way that little else does.

Such was the case last week, when we were witness to the inevitable outpouring of response—not least in the pages of The New York Times and The Washington Post.

First, from Tom Wicker, in The New York Times, came a series of jibes such as "The Russians are coming again, folks," along with explanations that warnings about the possibility of a Soviet beachhead in Nicaragua amounted to no more than "ritual anti-Communist Redspotting."

Next came The Washington Post's Richard Cohen to tell us that the charges against Nicaragua were "lies," that Nicaragua has "an admirable record on human rights" compared with El Salvador.

By which he meant, needless to say, the deeds of the U.S.-backed government of El Salvador, and not the bloody history of that country's Marxist-Leninist rebels.

But above all, the week produced a response by Times columnist Russell Baker in which he brought word that the president was obsessed by "the Red menace in Nicaragua."

Whereas for himself, Mr. Baker went on to tell in his homespun way, the menace preying on his mind was the disrepair in which the Internal Revenue Service finds itself.

Now everyone knows that jibes about the IRS mean we are in the presence of wit and humor—of a certain order. It's even more true, of course, of talk about "pinkos" and "the Red menace" of the kind larding this newest piece of homespun from columnist Baker.

So how did it come about that the net effect of this wit was to set us to thinking, not laughing; thinking, in particular, what it means that we now should be reading so many fun words about communism and its enemies—about pinkos, Red Menaces, about "ritual anti-Communist Red-spotting," and the Russians-are-coming-again-folks routine for which we were indebted to Mr. Wicker?

For these are words with a history: words that can reliably be counted on to summon that whole canon of contemptuous disbelief with which generations of liberal intellectuals have always viewed the idea of a Soviet threat, not to say, the long, unspeakable catalog of crimes committed in the name of socialist progress.

Here we can get some sense of that audience to which cozy snickers about the Red menace are addressed, that audience which in its heart of hearts is more repelled by anti-Communist zealotry than by the bloodiest deeds of the Soviet state. That audience is forever prohibited, by the strictures of liberal "toleration," from passing judgment on the evils of other systems.

Having, with this audience in mind, set a proper stage with jokes about Reds and pinkos, along with like references suggesting the looniness of those given to worrying about new Soviet outposts, our Times columnist proceeded with his theme, which, it should by now have surprised no reader to learn, was calculated to inform us of the outrageousness of any design on the part of the United States that might seek to dictate "the destiny of Central America."

Still, what should one say of the rhetoric on display here—this assortment of taunts suggesting how absurd, how blind, and how doubtless malign are those persuaded of the reality of a Soviet menace?

How is it still possible, after so many decades' proof, so much blood spilled, so much testimony to the nature of the Soviet system, for them to write such things—to think such things?

Why this is so is clear enough: to the liberal-enlightened of which Messrs. Baker and Wicker are such prime specimens, the barbarism of the Soviets is simply not real.

The systematic slaughter of millions, the aggression which swallows countries and their peoples whole, for this audience do not exist emotionally as does, say, the fact that the president of the United States might be guilty of excessive rhetoric directed at a new Soviet surrogate.

To this phenomenon we can find nowhere else any answer as good as the question put by Alexander Solzhenitsyn, who wrote of the incapacity of Western intellectuals to absorb the truth about the Soviet system:

"Is it possible or impossible to warn someone of danger? How many witnesses have been sent to the West in the last 60 years? How many immigrants? How many millions of persons?

"They're all here. You meet them every day. They have brought you exactly the same experience. They tell you exactly the same thing.

"They warn you of what is already happening—of what has happened in the past."

Perhaps, between chortles over the Red menace (and while the rest of the world stands by as the Afghan villages burn), Messrs. Baker and Wicker can spare a moment to ponder the words of Solzhenitsyn.●

FIFTY YEARS OF SECURITY

HON. TED WEISS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, among the many treasures that Americans enjoy, the Social Security Program surely ranks as one of the most important. For a full 50 years, Americans have enjoyed the protections of this life-saving program.

The following article, written by Max Manes, a resident of the 17th Congressional District of New York, eloquently describes the importance of the Social Security system, the nature of the threat that it currently faces, and the need to join together in defending and improving it. Mr. Manes is a 79-year-old activist for the rights of the elderly, Chairman of Seniors for Adequate Social Security, and president of the Amalgamated Clothing and Textile Workers Union [ACTWU] Headwear Joint Board retiree group. His article is excerpted from the February 1985 edition of Seniority, a newsletter for ACTWU retirees.

I believe that Mr. Manes' assessment of the status of Social Security on the occasion of its 50th anniversary is insightful and will prove to be of use to all Members of Congress in addressing this crucial issue. I commend it to my colleagues' attention.

AFTER 50 YEARS, SOCIAL SECURITY SEEN AS ONE OF NATION'S 'MOST SIGNIFICANT' LAWS

(By Max Manes)

On Aug. 14, 1935, President Franklin D. Roosevelt signed the bill passed by Congress establishing the Social Security System (SSS). The importance of that event 50 years ago can hardly be overstated. A 1982 study by the Employees Benefit Research Institution states: "The Social Security Act of 1935 has proved to be one of the most significant pieces of legislation—if not the most significant piece—ever enacted by the Congress of the United States."

How much the system means to the American people is widely recognized, although opponents have tried to downgrade it and create an impression of Social Security as a problem rather than a solution.

Social Security is "A . . . system of protection in old age, survivorship, disability and sickness, touching the lives of practically every family in the United States," says J. Douglas Brown of Princeton University in An American Philosophy of Social Security.

"Entitlements to future Social Security benefits are the most important asset of most American families, and actual benefits have played a central part in reducing poverty among the aged," declares the Brookings Institute's Henry J. Aaron in Economic Effect of Social Security.

In 1937 the U.S. Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of the Social Security Act. On the 40th anniversary of the system, the AFL-CIO pointed out that, based on the Constitution, "This legislation enunciated for the first time the principle that American citizens are entitled to safeguards in time of need.

Support for Social Security among the people was always strong and has ranked it as the most popular federal program in the nation since its inception. As Business Week (on 11/29/82) observed: "The American people . . . have carried on a love affair with Social Security." It is this great popularity which has been the main obstacle to the ceaseless efforts by opponents of the system to weaken and undermine it. The broad public support was manifested in election campaigns, surveys, mail to Congress, grassroots lobbying, public rallies and various other demonstrative actions whenever the system was threatened.

It is ironic that the 50th anniversary of this vital program should occur when we have a president in the White House who has a long record of enmity for Social Security, and under whose Administration the system has been subjected to the most severe attack in its history.

Long before he became President, Ronald Reagan crusaded against Social Security along with foes of the system from the world of business, finance, insurance and extreme right wing groups. He joined Barry Goldwater in attacks on it during the Arizona senator's 1964 presidential campaign. He fought against the enactment of Medicare. Under his presidency, Social Security benefits—and other programs for human needs such as Medicare, Medicaid, SSI, Food Stamps, etc.—have been drastically reduced in callous disregard for the millions of Americans who depend on them.

To disarm opposition to the cutbacks, Reagan and his Administration disguised the assaults on the system with the claim that they were only trying to "save it from bankruptcy." David Stockman, Reagan's budget director, confessed in an interview in the The Atlantic magazine in December 1981 as to the purpose of this scare tactic: "It will permit the politicians to make it look like they are doing something for the beneficiary population when they are doing something to it."

In his '84 campaign Reagan promised not to cut Social Security benefits. But he had made similar promises in 1980, only to break them. We must not allow a repeat performance in his second term. We must not lose sight of the fact that, even as he was making these promises on the campaign trail, his Administration was continuing to scheme against Social Security, Medicare, Medicaid and all social programs.

"Top officials of the Social Security Administration," said a report from Washington in the New York Times last October 14, "have been studying proposals for changes in the retirement program, including some that would make participation voluntary, while encouraging reliance on private insurance, pensions and savings. . . ." Acting Commissioner of Social Security Martha A. McSteen, "confirmed" attending such a meeting.

"There have been recurrent reports of the Reagan Administration's designs on Social Security benefits," warns Elizabeth Wickenden, director of the Study Group on Social Security, which watches developments concerning the system closely. The studies encompass "reduction, postponement or elimination" of cost of living increases, "restructuring downward of the whole system . . . privatization . . . means testing . . . increasing Medicare charges," in effect reducing cash benefits, etc.

It would be both a farce and a tragedy if the 50th anniversary year of this historic legislation should be misused by the Reagan Administration to parade as a friend of Social Security while masking further attacks to undermine it. Preventing this from taking place must be a priority task for all of us who have a stake in the system, both old and young.

When F.D.R. signed the Social Security Act, he referred to it as "a cornerstone of a structure which is being built—but is by no means complete." Marking the Act's 40th year, the AFL–CIO stated: "In order to fulfull the proper role, the legislation must be constantly improved." But this is not what Reagan wants. His course is detrimental to the system, and must be reversed. There must be no "Bi-partisan" cooperation with Reagan's course. No more cuts in any guise. Benefits that have been cut should be restored, and we must continue strong efforts to build and improve the structure of the system.

Our aim should be the goal visualized by the original architects of the system of Social Security—F.D.R.'s Cabinet level Committee on Economic Security. In its report proposing the Social Security System, which Roosevelt sent to Congress with a message urging enactment, the committee said: "A program of economic security as we envision it must have as its primary aim the assurance of an adequate income to each human being in childhood, youth, middle age or old age—in sickness or in health."●

CONTINUE FEDERAL ASSISTANCE TO AMTRAK

HON. JAMES J. FLORIO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, the administration has proposed the elimination of all Federal funding for Amtrak, our Nation's rail passenger system. The administration disputes claims that this cut will result in the cessation of all service by arguing that States, localities, and the private sector will assume the most profitable services, particularly those on the Northeast corridor.

Unfortunately, there are no takers. The Northeast Corridor Commuter Rail Authorities Committee [NECCRAC] recently passed a resolution stating that "the commuter rail authorities have neither the physical assets nor the financial resources to absorb the intercity passenger rail service now provided by Amtrak." Furthermore, the president of the Association of American Railroads [AAR], Mr. William Dempsey, recently wrote that he "has heard no such interest expressed by any freight railroad" to reenter the rail passenger business.

Since neither the commuter authorities nor the private sector are willing or able to assume some of the Amtrak lines, it is clear that the administration's argument is no longer valid. Letters from both NECCRAC and AAR follow:

NJ TRANSIT,
Newark, NJ, April 9, 1985.

Hon. JAMES J. FLORIO,
Chairman, House Transportation, Commerce and Tourism Subcommittee, Washington, DC.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN FLORIO: The Northeast Corridor Commuter Rail Authorities Committee (NECCRAC) represents the commuter rail and state agencies providing commuter rail service on the Northeast Corridor. A list of NECCRAC members is attached. Collectively these commuter railroads provide over one million daily trips of which over 150,000 occur on the Northeast Corridor. Each of these commuter agencies has relationships with Amtrak which are predicated on a healthy intercity rail system.

On March 6 the NECCRAC members passed the attached resolution urging continued federal assistance to Amtrak. It is important to realize that cuts to the Amtrak budget effect not only intercity service but also affect the regional commuter railroads and the individuals and businesses who rely on those essential services.

I am sure the attached resolution conveys the importance of Northeast Corridor service to commuter rail operations. Please contact me any time NECCRAC can be of assistance to you.

Sincerely,

JEROME C. PREMO,
Executive Director, NJ Transit, Chairman, Northeast Corridor Commuter Rail Authorities Committee.

Attachment.

NORTHEAST CORRIDOR COMMUTER RAIL AUTHORITIES COMMITTEE [NECCRAC]

NJ Transit, Port Authority Trans-Hudson Corporation [PATH], Long Island Railroad [LIRR], Metro North, Southeastern Pennsylvania Transit Authority [SEPTA], Massachusetts Bay Transit Authority [MBTA], Connecticut Department of Transportation, Maryland Department of Transportation.

NECCRAC RESOLUTION

Whereas, the Fiscal Year 1986 Administration budget proposal eliminates all funding for the National Railroad Passenger Corporation (Amtrak), which would result in the elimination of all intercity rail passenger service, including that on the Northeast Corridor; and

Whereas, the Northeast Corridor is an essential intercity and commuter transportation link among the great urban centers of Boston, New Haven, New York, Providence, Newark, Trenton, Philadelphia, Wilmington, Baltimore and Washington, D.C.; and

Whereas, the Northeast Corridor and related facilities provide for approximately over 150 thousand daily trips for commuter rail passengers and Amtrak travellers who would otherwise rely on congested highways and over-burdened airport facilities; and

Whereas, the combined services of the commuter rail agencies and Amtrak provide the most cost-efficient use of the Northeast Corridor by allocating costs between both types of services; and

Whereas, the goal of the $2.5 billion Northeast Corridor Improvement Project would not be realized; and

Whereas, this proposed abrupt cessation of federal aid to intercity rail passenger service would summarily reverse 15 years of progress in dealing with financial and operational rail transportation issues and would cause unnecessary turmoil in the northeast region's transportation services; and

Whereas, cessation of Amtrak operations would cost the commuter rail agencies approximately $85 million per year in increased operating costs and would require a substantial one-time investment to dismantle a portion of the Northeast Corridor Improvement Investment not required for commuter operations; and

Whereas, the Commuter Rail Authorities have neither the physical assets nor the financial resources to absorb the intercity passenger rail service now provided by Amtrak; and

Whereas, discontinuance of all Amtrak functions on October 1, 1985, would pose a grave threat of disruption of commuter service on the Northeast Corridor;

Whereas, therefore be it Resolved, that the Northeast Corridor Commuter Rail Authorities Committee (NECCRAC) endorses the continuation of essential intercity rail passenger service, particularly on the Northeast Corridor;

Now therefore be it resolved, that the Northeast Corridor Commuter Rail Authorities Committee (NECCRAC) endorses the continuation of essential intercity rail passenger service, particularly on the Northeast Corridor;

Be it further Resolved, that NECCRAC urges the Congressional Delegations of Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland and Washington, D.C. to support the continuation of federal assistance to Amtrak, thereby maintaining essential intercity rail passenger service on the Northeast Corridor and avoiding major adverse impacts on commuter service.

Be it further Resolved, that copies of this resolution be sent to those delegations cited above, and to the Speaker of the House and the Senate Majority Leader, and the chairmen of the House and Senate Budget, Authorizing, and Appropriating Committees.

ASSOCIATION OF AMERICAN RAILROADS,
Washington, DC, March 5, 1985.

Hon. JAMES J. FLORIO,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Commerce, Transportation, and Tourism, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I have your letter of February 27th inquiring whether any freight railroad members of the AAR "have expressed any . . . interest in reentering the rail passenger business." I have heard no such interest expressed by any freight railroad. Moreover, in view of the past experience of the railroad industry with rail passenger service, it is hard for me to believe that any freight railroad would be interested in getting back into that service. However, I am sending a copy of this letter to the members of the AAR Board of Directors—the chief executives of the nine largest roads and of four medium-sized roads—so that if I am wrong they can let you know.

Sincerely,

WILLIAM H. DEMPSEY,
President.●

MR. LESLIE R. SMITH, PRESIDENT, SAN PEDRO PENINSULA HOSPITAL

HON. GLENN M. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to Leslie R. Smith, who has served as president of San Pedro Peninsula Hospital since 1974. On Tuesday, April 30, Mr. Smith will be honored with the National Management Association's Gold Knight of Management Award for his outstanding leadership at the hospital and in the community.

Leslie Smith has been one of the most influential leaders in the health care field in the Los Angeles area for many years. After graduating from the University of Southern California with a master's degree in hospital administration, he went to work for the Los Angeles County Hospital System. In 20 years there, he rose to the peak of his field, becoming chief executive officer of Los Angeles County-USC Medical Center—the largest hospital in the world. He served as CEO at LAC-USC Medical Center for 5 years before assuming the presidency of San Pedro Peninsula Hospital.

During his tenure as president, Les Smith has led the way in assuring that the San Pedro community has the finest health care available. He has initiated and overseen the expansion of the hospital to a 247 bed acute medical/surgical center and a 398 bed multidisciplinary medical center, and has instituted a wide variety of innovative programs in such areas as chemical dependency, dialysis, and eating disorders. In short, he has turned a small community hospital into a major medical center.

He exhibited tremendous foresight and managerial skill in guiding the hospital through the traumatic shift from Medicare's cost-based reimbursement system to the new prospective payment system Congress instituted in 1983. His hard work and ability enabled the hospital to sail smoothly through the transition while other hospitals foundered. He has not only run San Pedro Peninsula Hospital efficiently, he has maintained such good community relations that the hospital has netted $2.3 million in donations during his stewardship.

Les Smith's achievements have not been limited to his work at the hospital. He has been a member of the San Pedro Rotary Club since 1974 and is a member of the board of directors of the San Pedro Chamber of Commerce. He played a key role in establishing national management association chapters at Los Angeles County-USC Medical Center and San Pedro Peninsula Hospital, he has appeared on numerous television programs to discuss health care issues, and has shared his many years of accumulated knowledge with graduate students in the field of hospital administration.

My wife Lee joins me in congratulating Leslie Smith on the occasion of his receipt of the National Management Association's Gold Knight of Management Award. We wish him and his wife Edie and their children Tim, Erin, and Melinda continued success.●

AT THE 5 & 10

HON. WILLIAM LEHMAN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. LEHMAN of Florida. Mr. Speaker, one of America's oldest traditions is the 5 & 10 store. For generations, the family-owned retail outlet has been a part of our culture as well as an integral part of our economy.

In the 17th Congressional District, many families—my own included—have known and enjoyed the pleasures and benefits of the Miami Shores 5 & 10, a store that has been in one location for over 30 years.

During that time, much has changed in the area of North Dade—that's what makes the long family tradition of the Miami Shores 5 & 10 so very comfortable and reassuring.

I wish to offer my personal congratulations to the Simons for adding a special flavor to an important part of North Dade.

Portions of an article from the Miami Herald follow:

SHOPPERS FIND JUST THE THING

(By Jean Claude de la France)

When Jeanne Wilbar, late of Miami Shores and currently of McIntosh, Fla., wanted mugs, threads and school supplies, she knew just where to go.

"This is a place where you can get something for everyone," Wilbar said, picking out her choices at the Miami Shores 5 & 10 store, 9531 NE Second Ave. "I like the hometown atmosphere and you never have to wait in line."

"I moved to McIntosh about four years ago but whenever I'm in town, which is about two or three times a year, I make it a point to stop in here," Wilbar said as she rifled the pages of some school notebooks.

"It's the small-town atmosphere," Wilbar said of the Miami Shores store. "I guess it relates back to when I was a little girl growing up in West Virginia."

Bert and Horty Simon, owners of the Miami Shores store for 31 years, get the same loyalty from their clientele.

"I've been coming here ever since I was growing up," said Victoria Peach, director of the Von Wadel Montessori School in Miami Shores. "Mr. Simon has been here forever and he has always been very nice and the kids all love him."

"If they had milk and bread I'd never have to go anywhere else," said Barbara Hampton, a daily visitor at the Shores' 5 & 10.

"There are a lot of little things you can't find anymore," said Horty Simon. "For example they don't make sweater guards and adjustable garters anymore."

"I guess you can count all the 5 & 10 stores in Florida on the fingers of two hands," said Cy Steinberg, an employee at Simon's store.

But as long as they exist, people like Michael Stanco will be coming in with a new generation.

"I come here with my granddaughter and my grandson," Stanco said while wrestling a box of crayons away from Anthony Grondin. "We find it comfortable. It's convenient and they got exactly what we need and in quantity, too."●

CIVIL RIGHTS ENFORCEMENT IS A DUTY OF THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. RANGEL. Mr. Speaker, I rise to bring an excellent article to the attention of my colleagues. It was recently written by Mary Frances Berry, an outstanding member of the Commission on Civil Rights.

Once upon a time, before the Reagan era, the enforcement of civil rights was a proud and honorable duty of the Federal Government. Civil rights were cherished as the right of all Americans, and the Federal branch vigorously enforced this right. The U.S. Commission on Civil Rights was created as an independent task force, free from changes in political temperament.

As my colleagues know, President Reagan is attempting to politicize the Commission, to force it to tow his ideological line. Even Richard Nixon avoided this kind of interference.

The following article is very edifying, and I submit it for the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The article follows:

[From the Nation, Feb. 2, 1985]

TAMING THE CIVIL RIGHTS COMMISSION

(Mary Frances Berry)

About a year and a half ago, there was a brief time when it looked as if the Reagan Administration's bid to take over the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights would fail. After President Reagan fired commissioner Blandina Ramirez and me in October 1983, a Federal court ordered our reinstatement on the ground that the commission is an independent government agency and not subject to Presidential control. But one month later, after considerable maneuvering, the Administration succeeded in gaining a majority on the commission. Since then, the Reagan commissioners have followed a radically different course from that of their predecessors.

From its founding, in 1957, by President Dwight D. Eisenhower, the commission had been made up of distinguished men and women who were dedicated to advancing the cause of civil rights rather than the interests of a particular politician or ideology. Most of them served for many years, under several Presidents. When they criticized government policies or agencies, no one tried to fire them. President Reagan's attack on sitting commissioners represented a break with that tradition, as did his appointment of new commissioners who share his goal of weakening existing civil rights remedies.

The major work in transforming the commission has been done by staff director Linda Chavez and chair Clarence Pendleton Jr. (who likes to insist that the President is colorblind, although the White House announcement of his appointment referred to him as the first black to head the commission). They have been assisted by John Bunzel and Morris Abram. Esther Gonzales-Arroyo Buckley and Robert Destro have been largely taken for granted by the others, who count on them to go along with whatever they propose. Francis Guess at first seemed to be an Administration rubber stamp, although he has since become increasingly assertive.

By law the commission must study and collect information, investigate allegations of discrimination and evaluate government laws and policies. Since last January it has contradicted its own procedures, issued statements before it investigates the facts, muzzled its state advisory committees to prevent them from announcing unacceptable conclusions and sidestepped experienced Civil Service staff members.

The commission has for the most part abandoned its responsibility to monitor the activities of the civil rights enforcement agencies of the Federal government. Not one report or statement about any Federal body has been issued since the takeover. Indeed, the commission has become so much a public relations operation for the Administration that its members have been referred to in the media as "Administration spokespersons." At the commission's first meeting last year, the new majority quickly issued a statement chastising the Supreme Court for upholding a lower court's decision in Bratton v. City of Detroit. Citing a voluminous trial record that proved the city's Police Department had been biased in its hiring and promotion policies, the lower court had ordered the department to set quotas for the promotion of qualified black and white police officers on a one-to-one basis. The commission's statement was consistent with the Administration's opposition to affirmative action quotas. (Administration officials had falsely characterized the issue of quotas as the basis of the dispute with the previous commissioners.)

When the Supreme Court held in Firefighters Local Union No. 1784 v. Stotts that seniority prevails over some affirmative action remedies, the commission quickly praised the decision as the death knell for group-victimization theories and affirmative action goals. Its statement, like the one on the Detroit case, was issued before the commission had investigated the factual context of the case. Contrary to the commission's characterization, however, courts of appeal have since interpreted the Stotts decision narrowly, leaving most affirmative action remedies in place.

Other violations of commission procedures have occurred in the service of more blatantly political aims. For example, Abram told the White House that I had suggested the commission discuss the President's reluctance to repudiate an endorsement of his re-election bid by Bill Wilkinson, Grand Wizard of the Ku Klux Klan. During a break in the next meeting, Abram produced a letter from the President repudiating the Klan but not Wilkinson. Then, without commission approval, Abram called a press conference to announce the letter. In another departure from procedure, and without the other commissioners' approval or a preliminary investigation by the staff, Pendleton asked the Democratic Presidential candidates what they thought about remarks allegedly made by Louis Farrakhan and how they thought Jesse Jackson should respond. Although I had stated publicly that Jackson should repudiate Farrakhan if the statements had been made, I argued that the commission should avoid injecting itself into a partisan political controversy before we had ascertained the facts. Pendleton and his cohorts agreed to take no further action after it seemed Guess and Destro would join Ramirez and me in formally reprimanding them for flouting the rules. But during the Presidential race, issuing pronouncements without consulting the other commissioners became a habit with Pendleton. Taking sides in an intra-Administration fight, he publicly criticized the President for supporting the practice of awarding a set percentage of Federal contracts to minority businesses and for convening a meeting of blacks he had appointed to government jobs.

In still another departure from policy, the majority voted to require state advisory committees (composed of citizens appointed by the commission who serve without pay to monitor civil rights problems in their states) to submit their reports to Washington for review prior to their release. The reason given was that the reports had been uneven and had ranged too far afield. Actually, the majority was unhappy with the state bodies because they had continued to work on issues of which it disapproved, such as equal opportunity budgets.

Blandina Ramirez and I find the majority's refusal to undertake the required hearings and investigations before issuing statements abhorrent, but our protests have gone unheeded. After the Supreme Court's decision in Grove City College v. Bell, which narrowed the scope of the language in Title IX of the Civil Rights Act prohibiting sex discrimination in education, we suggested that the commission issue a statement calling on Congress to pass a law nullifying the decision's impact. Such a statement could draw on data compiled by the commission staff in the last five years. The majority opposed such a statement. They supported new legislation but said it should include language opposing certain affirmative action remedies and adding a requirement that intent to discriminate be proved.

Staff director Chavez, who has no policy-making powers under the law, has also spoken out publicly on policy matters. After the House passed the Civil Rights Act of 1984, she provided a detailed analysis of the bill's shortcomings to anti-civil-rights senators and to the media. When Represenative Don Edwards accused her of suggesting crippling amendments to the opposition, Chavez asserted that she had only responded to the senators' requests for technical assistance, in keeping with the commission's past procedures. When Pendleton was queried about Chavez's actions at a commission meeting, he said he approved of everything she had done.

There was more to come. Without consulting the other commissioners, Pendleton canceled our November meeting and held a press conference instead. He and Chavez used the occasion to denounce the idea of equal pay for similar jobs, or comparable worth, an issue much in the news at the time because of the clerical workers' strike at Yale University [see editorial, "Women of Yale," The Nation, December 1, 1984]. Pendleton called it the "looniest idea since Looney Tunes." Back in January, Abram had already announced his opposition to comparable worth at a commission press conference. In effect, those statements prejudged the issue, meaning that any future commission findings regarding comparable worth will have little credibility.

That press conference followed a widely publicized speech in which Pendleton had attacked black voters and certain black leaders for not supporting Reagan in the election. Even two from the usual majority couldn't stomach that one. They planned to raise the issue of violations of procedure at the commission's December meeting, but the chair canceled it.

I see little possibility that the commission will act any more independently in the near future than it has up to now. The majority and the staff director can be expected to say whatever is politically expedient. They have commissioned studies by consultants who have previously expressed views consistent with White House policy on civil rights. Instead of producing reports that will command broad respect from Congress and the public, they can be expected to support the Administration's retreat on civil rights protections.

The Commission on Civil Rights has become a parody of its former self, a politicized institution for the first time in its history. Contrary to Administration claims, the Reaganites' takeover of the commission did not stem from a battle about busing or quotas. Rather, they could not tolerate the commission's challenge on a number of points; the tax exemption for Bob Jones University, the White House's unprecedented refusal to supply information to the commission except under threat of subpoena, its opposition to extending the Voting Rights Act in 1982, its attempts to lessen the protection against sex discrimination in education under Title IX and the removal of some remedies for victims of job discrimination. Until the majority of Americans are ready to take up the unfinished business of providing equality of opportunity in this society, the commission is unlikely to contribute to any further progress in civil rights.●

THE FARMBELT CRISIS

HON. JIM ROSS LIGHTFOOT

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. LIGHTFOOT. Mr. Speaker, I insert the attached article into that portion of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD entitled Extensions of Remarks. Mr. Wollenhaupt has aptly pointed out some of the problems we, in rural America, are facing and his comments are worthy of our attention.

THE FARMBELT CRISIS

The predicament of many midwest farmers is well known. Decreasing land values, high interest rates, and inadequate income for farm products have resulted in quite severe deterioration in loan quality for agricultural lenders. What are the causes and what are the solutions? It is natural to accept the premise that there are causes. It also seems reasonable to believe there must be solutions. One major cause has to be inflation. The next question then is what caused inflation? Inflation is a result of the government creating too much money. Why was this permitted? Because the role of government in our lives has expanded enormously and has gotten out of control. We have had inflation because inflation is possible and is fueled by our present paper-money system.

In her book, "The March of Folly," Barbara W. Tuchman makes an interesting observation:

"A phenomenon noticeable through history regardless of place or period is the pursuit by governments of policies contrary to their own interest. Mankind, it seems, makes a poorer performance of government than of almost any other human activity. In this sphere, wisdom, which may be defined as the exercise of judgment acting on experience, common sense, and available information, is less operative and more frustrated than it should be. Why do holders of high office so often act contrary to the way reason points and enlightened self-interest suggests? Why does intelligent mental process seem so often not to function?"

Barbara Tuchman was not addressing the farm problem per se but her thoughts cause one to reflect on the wisdom of policies and programs of government through the course of time. Inflation is the result of printing-press money which evolved during the 1930's when our government elected to abandon the gold-coin standard. Printing press money was substituted at that time for the previously gold-backed dollar. The purpose was to increase the money supply which in turn was to stimulate the economy by raising prices. It enabled the government to spend vast sums of money without having to tax the citizenry. Spending these newly created dollars would "make things happen." It did and we are now suffering the results through government intervention, distortions, disruptions, and imbalances between production and prices.

Under a goldstandard-monetary system the supply of money was restricted by the supply of gold a country held. Also, paper money was redeemable in gold so that people could turn in their paper dollars for gold when they felt government spending was excessive. Monetary policy should be responsive and obedient to a firm discipline. There is little discipline inherent in a fiat paper money system such as we are using today. Under a gold standard corrections were automatic and were only as severe as need be to restore stability.

Farmers, in particular, are victimized more than they are helped by our paper money which has brought us the rampant inflation of recent years. There is something euphoric identified with inflation that distorts one's thinking. There is the expectation that no matter what something costs today it will be worth much more tomorrow and next year. Many farmers were enticed to buy land at high prices based on this expectation. During the period 1970-1980 land prices on the average in Iowa rose from about $400 per acre to $2,100. This is largely the result of inflation psychology.

It is natural to look to government for solutions and assistance in times of economic stress. Government's efforts to help have fueled inflation. Probably the most important single factor that has led to our persistent inflation since the 1930's has been the changing role of government.

Milton Friedman, Nobel Prize Winner in economics, states in a speech given in early 1984 concerning the role of government: "From being an umpire whose major function was to protect the nation against foreign enemies, the federal government has become a solver of all problems, big brother to everybody."

In the short-run the farmer is faced with the problem of survival hoping for a quick turn-around in terms of better prices for his products. His immediate need is for more income through higher prices for products sold, lower interest rates, and reduced costs of production. More credit cannot be obtained without the ability to repay debt.

In the long-run inflation must not only be reduced further, but it must be restrained from taking off again toward double digit figures. One way to control inflation is to limit government spending. Increasing taxes is not a solution to our economic well being. This only restricts economic expansion and job creation. It is also vitally necessary for Congress to adopt a balanced budget along with reducing spending and taxes. It is ridiculous to believe we can continue to have the prodigious budget deficits as at present.

Many Congressmen are hesitant and unwilling to cut spending programs. They are no doubt of good intention in their efforts to continue to increase the many programs which have been put into place to ease the financial difficulties experienced by many people. However, a greater assistance could well be afforded by restoring a balanced budget even if this requires a constitutional amendment.

Natural market forces must be restored as a means of governing our markets replacing the numerous and ineffective programs which have been tried and found wanting. Economist Don Paarlberg speaks to this:

"Nobody has had the courage to say it. But the last few years have clearly demonstrated the commodity programs are a failure," says Don Paarlberg, former head of economics for the USDA, who has had as much experience administrating them as anyone. "Where is the equity when 48% of the program benefits go to the top 10% of the farmers?" Paarlberg asks. "What is the efficiency in retiring the world's best land?" (Farm Journal, January 1985)

Perhaps it would be best if the Federal Government would resume its intended role of being an umpire, in defending our shores, protecting property, administering justice, and letting natural market forces rule economic activity. At the state level many of our politicians seem obsessed with the notion that our state's future lies in promoting horse racing and lottery—that such means are now needed to acquire funds for our public coffers. It is tantamount to ironic jest that the paper dollars to be used for such purposes bear the inscription "In God We Trust."

And so we continue the "March of Folly." Badly needed: more wisdom—less folly.—Courtesy of the Wollenhaupt, Director, First National Bank, Fontanelle, IA.●

MODIFICATION OF ACCOUNTING RULES FOR FEDERAL LONG-TERM CONTRACTS

HON. FORTNEY H. (PETE) STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill designed to make some major Federal contractors pay their fair share of taxes by revising the accounting methods used to determine those contractors' tax liability. My bill focuses on what is known as the "completed contract accounting method," and is expected to raise very significant new revenue without imposing any new tax.

How is this possible?

The Tax Code now allows taxpayers with long-term contracts to choose whether to pay Uncle Sam now or pay him later. But later just never seems to arrive for many profitable corporations doing Federal contract work, like Boeing, General Dynamics, and General Electric.

Current long-term contract accounting rules provide for an almost continual deferral of income from contracts while allowing numerous deductions for costs "up front." The completed contract method of accounting was devised to deal with long-term contracts in which the taxpayer could not ascertain his taxable income until the completion of the contract.

For shipbuilders with a Government contract, as an example, completed contract accounting allows Tax Day to be delayed 5 or 10 years even though the Federal Government gives the shipbuilder regularly scheduled payments on the contract costs and reimburses general overhead expenses of the shipbuilder. Even worse, Department of Defense regulations sometimes cushion the risk of cost overrun that may occur in any contract by providing that the Federal Government will pay for cost overruns as well.

My bill disallows the use of the completed contract method for computing income on Federal long-term contracts. Instead, a taxpayer will have to include in gross income the aggregate amount received under the contract each year or the amount determined under the percentage of completion method, whichever is greater.

Since accounting rules in the Tax Code are arcane—if not inane—I offer an example of how my bill will work. A taxpayer with a 5-year, $6 million contract with the Federal Government will account for the income as follows: In year 1, taxpayer receives $2 million payment and does no work on the project. The aggregate amount received in year one is greater than the amount under the percentage of completion method since no work was done on the project. Thus, the taxpayer must include $2 million in gross income in the year 1 and can correspondingly take any deductions which the taxpayer is entitled to in that same year.

The same taxpayer may receive no money in the second year but may complete one-third of the work stipulated under the contract. Under the percentage-of-completion method, the taxpayer would include in gross income $2 million, reflecting a $6 million project that is one-third complete. Since the taxpayer has already paid tax on one-third of the total contract amount, no income is included from this contract in the taxpayer's gross income in year 2.

In year 3, if the taxpayer receives $2 million and completes another third of the contract work, the aggregate amount received under the contract is $4 million. Two-thirds of the contract work has been completed. Since two-thirds of a $6 million project is equivalent to $4 million, the cash received to date equals the value of work completed in year 3. The taxpayer's gross income for this contract is, then, $4 million reduced by the $2 million that was included in gross income in a previous year.

The taxpayer may complete all the work on the project in year 4 but not receive any payments. The $6 million contract is 100 percent complete under the percentage-of-completion method. Since the amount determined under the percentage of completion method—$6 million—is greater than the aggregate amount of payments received under the contract in year 4 and prior years—$4 million—the taxpayer must include in gross income $6 million reduced by the $4 million already included in income in prior years.

By the fifth year, when the last payment of $2 million is made, the entire contract amount of $6 million has already been included in gross income in prior taxable years at times which reflect both the progress and the payment schedule of the contract. Likewise, deductions are allowed as they arise instead of being deferred until the end of the contract or taken prematurely.

Thus, the bill addresses the two timing problems that now occur with the use of the completed contract method of accounting: inappropriate deferral of taxes and allocation of deductions. The bill will apply to all long-term contracts in which the Federal Government—including agencies and instrumentalities thereof—is a party, and to subcontracts under Federal long-term contracts. The modifications required under this bill apply to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1985.

Mr. Speaker, I want to welcome General Dynamics, Boeing, General Electric to the ranks of American taxpayers.

The bill is as follows:

H.R. 2214

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,"

SECTION 1. MODIFICATION OF ACCOUNTING RULES FOR FEDERAL LONG-TERM CONTRACTS.

(a) GENERAL RULE.—The Secretary of the Treasury or his delegate shall modify the income tax regulations relating to accounting for long-term contracts to provide that—

(1) the amount includible in gross income with respect to any Federal long-term contract for any taxable year shall not be less than—

(A) the greater of (i) the aggregate amount received under such contract during the taxable year and prior taxable years, or (ii) the amount determined under the percentage of completion method for the taxable year and prior taxable years, reduced by

(B) the amount includible in gross income with respect to such contract for prior taxable years, and

(2) the completed contract method may not be used with respect to Federal long-term contracts.

(b) FEDERAL LONG-TERM CONTRACT.—For purposes of this section, the term "Federal long-term contract" means any long-term contract—

(1) to which the United States (or any agency or instrumentality thereof) is a party, or

(2) which is a subcontract under a contract described in paragraph (1).

For purposes of the preceding sentence, the rules of section 168(j)(4)(D) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to certain taxable entities not treated as instrumentalities) shall apply.

(c) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The modifications required under this section shall apply to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1985. For purposes of section 481 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, such modifications shall be treated as a change in the method of accounting of the taxpayer.●

1986 BUDGET PROPOSALS ENDANGER THE RETIREMENT SECURITY OF OLDER AMERICANS

HON. WILLIAM (BILL) CLAY

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. CLAY. Mr. Speaker, the "new" budget compromise agreed to by President Reagan and Senate Republicans contains the same old GOP priorities—major increases in military spending paid for by deep cuts in domestic programs. This latest proposal does the one thing President Reagan repeatedly promised he would not do—cut Social Security benefits. What Reagan's budget proposal would essentially do is set the annual cost-of-living adjustment [COLA] to Social Security benefits at 2 percent for each of the next 3 years. This proposed reduction would take away $3 billion in fiscal 1986 from Social Security funds and almost $23 billion for the 3 years proposed. On an individual basis this translates into a reduction for the average Social Security recipient of a loss of $81 in fiscal year 1986 and a total loss of about $600 over a 3-year period.

Social Security, the most widely received Government benefit, reaching 36.5 million retired men and women, is the key link between a decent retirement life and retirement years lived in poverty. Each year that cost-of-living adjustments are held down increases the number of retired people made poorer as they grow older. That is why the proposed COLA reduction is of such critical concern, because of its devastating effect on lower income Social Security beneficiaries. It is the poorest retirees who are the most dependent on the income received from Social Security. The Congressional Budget Office estimates that Social Security provides approximately 80 percent of the total income of elderly recipient families who are below or just above the poverty line. And it must not be forgotten that Social Security is a crucial income source not only for the elderly, but for the disabled, for orphans, and for widows or widowers with dependent children as well.

Aware of the importance of Social Security to some degree, the Republicans modestly propose to cushion the Social Security cut by increasing benefits under the Supplemental Security Income [SSI] Program—which provides cash assistance to aged, blind, or disabled people with very low incomes. But, many of the poor people who will be affected by the COLA reduction do not receive SSI and will not qualify under SSI's stringent income and asset tests.

According to estimates by the Congressional Budget Office, even with the SSI increase, almost 5 million poor or near poor families will suffer a net income loss from a cut. Without the SSI increase, 650,000 beneficiaries will be thrown below the poverty line by a COLA reduction. With an increase in SSI, there will be an increase of 570,000 people living in poverty, of whom 380,000 are elderly.

The proposed Social Security cutback with its effect on the poor and the elderly, represents a clear abandonment of President Reagan's repeated promises that he would oppose any cuts in Social Security benefits. These cuts are unfair and unjustifiable. They place an unfair burden on low-income Social Security recipients. The elderly have already suffered an unfair share of budget cuts over the past few years. Year after year corporations escape tax liability through corporate tax breaks, while those least able to pay are forced to contribute more. President Reagan must be held to his commitment to retired Americans, if not by the Republicans in the Senate then by the Democrats in the House. There must be no cut in Social Security benefits.●

CALIFORNIA VOICE OF DEMOCRACY WINNER

HON. GEORGE E. BROWN, JR.

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to congratulate Jeffrey Chance of Riverside, CA, who is the California State winner of the Voice of Democracy scriptwriting contest. Mr. Chance is a senior at Poly High School in Riverside, where he is active on the swimming team, the yearbook staff, and the foreign exchange program.

The VFW Voice of Democracy scholarship contest is a national program which began 37 years ago and has grown with VFW leadership to involve over 300,000 students this year. The program awards six scholarships totaling $32,500, with a scholarship of $14,000 going to the first-place winner. The VFW involves over 8,000 schools in this program, and over 4,000 VFW posts and 3,500 auxiliaries act as sponsors. Over 2,300 radio and TV stations cooperate in the program, continuing the partnership between the VFW and the broadcast industry which has existed for decades.

Given the scope of this contest, I am proud of Mr. Chance for writing the script which won the California State contest. His entry under this year's theme, "My Pledge to America," is an expression of the optimism which all of us share when we dream of this country's heritage. I would like to reprint the script which won Jeffrey Chance the California Voice of Democracy contest.

MY PLEDGE TO AMERICA

VFW VOICE OF DEMOCRACY SCHOLARSHIP PROGRAM

(California Winner, Jeffrey Chance, 5940 Intervale Drive, Riverside, CA. 92506)

"Thanks for the Memory". Who can listen to this refrain and not think of Bob Hope? "Somewhere Over the Rainbow"? Judy Garland. When Debbie Boone steps on stage, an orchestra plays, "You Light Up My Life". In the minds of many people, these songs symbolize the person associated with the song and symbolize their life, their achievements.

Songs, too, can symbolize countries. "The Star Spangled Banner" and "America the Beautiful" symbolize the United States, our values and what we as a country stand for. If I could choose one song to symbolize Americans, not collectively, but as individuals, I would choose the song, "The Impossible Dream". My pledge to America is that I will make this song my theme—that I will live the impossible dream.

The American dream of a better, more productive, happy life is not an impossible dream. Americans have made it possible. Not only have Americans achieved the dream. They have inspired the dream. Throughout history, people of other nations have flocked to the shores of the United States in search of an impossible dream. They have made their dreams reality. Today, dreams are just as achievable as they were when our forefathers signed a constitution guaranteeing freedom for the pursuit of life, liberty and happiness.

In the song, "The Impossible Dream", the lyrics speak of a person who fights for the right and reaches for unreachable stars. I am proud to be a part of a nation whose individuals fight for the right. I am grateful for those who went before to reach unreachable stars. Doubt said, "Impossible". But early astronauts said, "Possible," and walked on the moon.

The lyrics continue, ". . . to run where the brave dare not go". Americans have continually walked untrodden paths—paths to great heights, accomplishing great dreams. Jonas Salk dreamed of a vaccine that would someday cure polio and prolong life for millions. Martin Luther King, Jr., dreamed and inspired a dream of harmony and equality within America's ethnic groups. Obstacles fall when Americans reach for their dreams. Dreamers have made the United States the nation that it is. Dreamers among our youth must continue to make the nation strong, to solve problems that today have no solutions; to bring peace when peace seems impossible.

Our country is a nation of goal setters and dreamers. But setting the goal and dreaming the dream is not enough. We must take action consistent with our goals. Whether as an individual or a group, we must work with diligence to achieve our dreams. But dream, we must. America is in danger of losing the dream. There are those who continue to say, "Impossible". Youth must say, "Possible". We cannot, must not, will not give in to despair, to defeat or to fear. We must continue to dream, for as one man or woman achieves a dream, a nation benefits—a new medication, an improved technology, an opportunity, another era of peace. We must continue to inspire the dream—to make the impossible, possible for the largest number of people. We must share the products of our dreams.

My pledge to America is that I will continue the pattern set by my forefathers to pursue my own dream, being careful to take responsibility for the action that makes dreams come true. I pledge to inspire the dream, to reach to the downtrodden, the temporarily defeated, those who have lost faith. I pledge to encourage youth to take action, to take advantage of the educational, social and political opportunities of this country that put feet to our dreams.

In the words of Ruth Stafford Peale, "I will stand up to be counted among those millions of Americans who have learned that Liberty is responsibility".

I will dream an impossible dream and reach that dream, that someday the world will be a better place because I have lived and I have dreamed.●

REAR ADM. FREDERICK P. SCHUBERT, USCG, TO RETIRE

HON. GLENN M. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I have just been informed that the commander of the 11th Coast Guard District, Rear Adm. Frederick P. Schubert, USCG, whose headquarters is in my congressional district, will retire at the end of next month.

While I certainly respect Admiral Schubert's decision, as he has served his Nation as a Coast Guard officer for 33 years, I personally regret it as it means that we will be losing his services in the 11th Coast Guard District. It does not seem possible that he has already been in command for 2 years.

During this 2-year span of time Admiral Schubert certainly has been busy. Probably one of his most demanding tasks was directing the Coast Guard's preparation for the summer games of the XXIIId Olympiad. The Coast Guard was responsible for port safety and security, yachting venue security, dignitary protection, and explosive ordnance disposal. As we are all well aware of the smooth and incident-free manner in which the Olympics were conducted, I think it is evident that Admiral Schubert did an outstanding job—even though most of his work was beyond the public eye.

During his time with the 11th Coast Guard District, he also served as Pacific Region Coordinator of the National Narcotics Border Interdiction System. In this capacity, he worked with other Federal and local agencies serving on the Vice President's Task Force on Narcotics Interdiction with the mission of preventing the smuggling of illegal drugs into the Western United States, and apprehending those who attempted to do so. Under Admiral Schubert's guidance, coordination was established which will permit the continuing effective operation of the task force in the future.

Admiral Schubert has held a variety of demanding and challenging staff and command assignments since his graduation from the U.S. Coast Guard Academy in 1951. He holds master degrees in systems management from the University of Southern California, and in political science from Auburn University. A Coast Guard aviator, he was one of the very few Coast Guard officers choosen to attend the Air War College, graduating in 1971.

As he takes off his Coast Guard uniform and puts on civilian attire, my wife Lee joins me in wishing Fred Schubert, his wife Gloria, and their three children, Paul, Karen, and Robert, all the best in the years ahead. While his plans are not firm at this time, I am sure he will soon find himself actively engaged again in some endeavor which will demand the utmost of his time and talents. We wish him well.●

PRESIDENT REAGAN'S GERMAN VISIT

HON. WILLIAM LEHMAN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. LEHMAN of Florida. Mr. Speaker, the 40th anniversary of the liberation of the Nazi concentration camps has brought new and badly needed attention to the horrors of the Holocaust. A couple of weeks ago, a tape of Edward R. Murrow's radio broadcast on the liberation of Buchenwald was played on network television, accompanied by color film of the camp and its victims. Just this week, the New York Times printed excerpts from a radio broadcast by BBC commentator Patrick Gordon-Walker about the liberation of the Bergen-Belsen concentration camp. These excerpts, which every one of my colleagues should read carefully follow:

BERGEN-BELSEN, APRIL 24, 1945

I went to Belsen. The Wehrmacht is not allowed near it. It was entirely guarded by SS men and women. The first night of liberty, many hundreds of people died of joy. Next day some men of the [British] Yeomanry arrived. The people crowded around them, kissing their hands and feet—and dying from weakness.

Corpses in every state of decay were lying around, piled up on top of each other in heaps. One woman came up to a soldier who was guarding the milk store and doling the milk out to children, and begged for milk for her baby. The man took the baby and saw that it had been dead for days, black in the face and shriveled up. The woman went on begging for milk. So he poured some on the dead lips. The mother then started to croon with joy and carried the baby off in triumph. She stumbled and fell dead a few yards. . . .

About 35,000 corpses were reckoned, more actually than the living. . . . The SS men were driven and pushed along and made to ride on top of the loaded corpses and then shovel them into the great mass open graves. The SS women were made to cook and carry heavy loads. The inmates said that they were more cruel and brutal than the men. They are all young, in their twenties. . . .

There was no water, nothing but roots and some boiled stinking carrots, enough for a few hundred people. Men and women had fought for these raw, uncooked roots.

There are three main classes in the camp. The healthy, who have managed to keep themselves decent, but nearly all of these had typhus. Then there were the sick, who were more or less cared for by their friends. Then there was the vast underworld that had lost all self-respect, crawling around in rags, living in abominable squalor, defecating in the compound, often mad or half mad. . . .

There were a very large number of girls in the camp, mostly Jewesses from Auschwitz. Over and over again I was told the same story. The parades at which people were picked out arbitrarily for the gas chamber and the crematorium, where many were burned alive. Life and death was a question of pure chance. . . .

"My father and mother were burned. My sister was burned." This is what you hear all the time. . . . A story of Auschwitz was told to me by Helen—and her last name she didn't remember. She was a Czechoslovak. When the women were given the chance to go and work elsewhere in the work zones like Hamburg, mothers with children were, in fact, given the choice between their lives and their children's. Children could not be taken along. Many preferred to stay with their children and face certain death. Some decided to leave their children. But it got around amongst the 6-year-old childen that if they were left there they would at once be gassed. There were terrible scenes between children and their mothers. One child was so angry that though the mother changed her mind and stayed and died, the child would not talk to her. . . .

None of this is propaganda. This is the plain and simple truth.

Mr. Speaker, controversy has arisen and escalated over the plans of the President of the United States to visit not only Bergen-Belsen but also the German war cemetery at Bitburg, where more than 40 Waffen SS troopers are buried. This plan is an outrage which affronts many, many Americans of all ages and backgrounds, but particularly veterans who fought against Germany during World War II and Jewish and other survivors of the Holocaust. This intense and shocking description of Bergen-Belsen sharply demonstrates the impropriety—the immorality—of honoring members of Hitler's elite guard along with other German war dead.

Proposals, first to seek reconciliation over remembrance, then to "balance" a symbol of reconciliation with a symbol of the Holocaust, sadly and frighteningly reflect the shallowness of the perceptions of two leaders of the free world. Reading Mr. Gordon-Walker's comments in the context of the cemetery and/or concentration camp debate, I could not help recalling a poem I once taught in an English class at Miami-Dade Community College. The poem, T.S. Eliot's "The Hollow Men", is best known for its closing lines: "This is the way the world ends/Not with a bang but with a whimper." But it is the opening stanza that I recall now:

THE HOLLOW MEN

We are the hollow men
We are the stuffed men
Leaning together
Headpiece filled with straw. Alas!
Our dried voices, when
We whisper together
Are quiet and meaningless
As wind in dry grass
Or rats' feet over broken glass
In our dry cellar

Shape without form, shade without colour,
Paralysed force, gesture without motion;

Those who have crossed
With direct eyes, to death's other Kingdom
Remember us—if at all—not as lost
Violent souls, but only
As the hollow men
The stuffed men.

Mr. Speaker, the President must reconsider his decision and cancel the visit to Bitburg.●

THE CONSULTATION ON INTERNATIONAL SECURITY AND ARMS CONTROL

HON. THOMAS J. DOWNEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. DOWNEY of New York. Mr. Speaker, earlier this month I had the opportunity to participate in the Consultation on International Security and Arms Control which was cochaired by Presidents Jimmy Carter and Gerald Ford. This consultation, which was held at the Carter Center of Emory University, benefited from the presence of a large number of present and former government officials, academic experts and representatives from former governments. Personally, I found the atmosphere stimulating and the exchange of views was open and candid.

I would like to include in the RECORD the following letter from President Jimmy Carter which summarizes the recommendations of the consultation and which also lists the names of those who participated in the consultation. I urge my colleagues to consider carefully the recommendations arrived at during the consultation. Finally, I would like to thank Presidents Carter and Ford for their efforts in promoting a better understanding between the United States and the Soviet Union.

The letter follows:

EMORY UNIVERSITY,
THE CARTER CENTER,
Atlanta, GA, April 18, 1985.

Hon. THOMAS DOWNEY,
House of Representatives,
Washington, DC.

To: Representative Thomas Downey.

We are very grateful that you were able to attend our consultation on International Security and Arms Control, assessing the subjects of alliances, regional conflict, proliferation, weapons, strategy, doctrine, negotiations, and diplomatic-political aspects of U.S.-Soviet relations. There were often heated exchanges, but abusive rhetoric was minimal. All of us benefitted from the detailed discussions, especially concerning U.S.-Soviet relations, with an emphasis on arms control. Derived from the analyses, some unanimous recommendations were presented at the final public session. Those who agreed on these recommendations were Presidents Gerald Ford and I, the Soviet delegation, Senators Sam Nunn and Howard Baker, former Secretary of State Cyrus Vance, and the three panel chairmen, General Brent Scowcroft, Dr. Robert O'Neill, and Ambassador Ralph Earle.

For your interest, I have listed below some of the more significant recommendations that apply specifically to arms control.

1. The United States and the Soviet Union should continue to adhere to the Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty and the Outer Space Treaty and no steps should be taken contrary to the terms of those agreements until prior negotiations have been exhausted. Research is permitted by the ABM Treaty, but development and testing as proposed in the U.S. Strategic Defense Initiative are not. Through negotiation, the parties should clarify the terms of the ABM Treaty to distinguish between research and development, and there should be a clear notice of any possible plans to abrogate or deliberately violate the treaty's terms.

2. The United States and the Soviet Union should continue their existing policies of not taking steps to undercut the provisions of important treaties and other agreements that are not formally in effect, including the Interim Agreement on Offensive Arms, the Threshold Test Ban Treaty, and SALT II. Definitions and other non-controversial provisions of these agreements should be accepted as an integral part of ongoing or future negotiations.

3. Based on the U.S.-Soviet joint statement establishing the present Geneva talks, the two nations should make every effort to reduce greatly and further limit offensive nuclear arms, without letting the possibility of future developments in strategic defensive systems inhibit such reductions and limitations. The Soviet side appears to be unwilling to consider deep reductions in offensive weapons as long as the possibility of new strategic defensive deployments is not definitely foreclosed; the American side wishes to negotiate precisely such deep reductions while holding open the strategic defense option pending completion of research to establish its feasibility. Any such agreement should provide for a more stable balance, with weapons that contribute to overall strategic stability.

4. The sides should take more constructive and imaginative steps regarding verification of compliance with agreements, including cooperative measures that may include on-site inspection as appropriate and necessary to enhance such verification. (This was an important suggestion that came from the Soviet representatives during discussions about the Krasnoyarsk radar.) In this connection, issues of compliance should be resolved by both sides in a manner aimed at their resolution, not their exploitation for political or propaganda purposes, and the same criterion should be applied to negotiations themselves.

5. The United States and the Soviet Union should address with the utmost priority the question of establishing mechanisms aimed at crisis prevention and crisis management in order to avoid misunderstandings and/or miscalculations that could lead to conflict. Frequent and regular meetings of senior political and military leaders would be desirable.

6. In present and future negotiations, agreement on key issues should be implemented step-by-step through executive action, without waiting for a final comprehensive document to be signed before the benefits of such interim progress might be realized.

7. The parties should now begin to examine how to reduce offensive arsenals enough to minimize the incentives of either side to deploy extensive strategic defenses. Such a goal could be a relatively small number of single-warhead launchers (perhaps 2000) deployed as invulnerably as possible—in a mobile mode, in deep and hardened silos on the protected southern side of mountain ranges, or in ocean safe havens. The exact number is not as important as survivability and assured deterrence. Prior to the implementation of such a decision by the superpowers it will be necessary to induce the other nuclear nations to accept a comparable reduction in the arsenals.

8. The United States should ratify the Threshold Test Ban Treaty or make it clear that its terms will continue to be honored. Through mutual agreement, the explosion limits should be rapidly lowered commensurate with the technical ability for verification, ultimately to achieve a comprehensive test ban agreement.

9. Negotiations should be renewed to ban any deployment of weapons in space or the testing of anti-satellite weapons.

10. U.S.-Soviet consultations should include the question of non-proliferation. Regional agreements involving nuclear-free zones should be encouraged.

In addition, President Ford and I agreed with many participants that to avoid the frustrating failure of the United States government to ratify treaties that have been laboriously negotiated, the documents might be framed as executive agreements. These would require a majority vote in both houses of Congress, but would avoid the veto power of a mere one-third of the members of the Senate, many of whom are philosophically opposed to any reasonable agreement involving arms control, the Soviet Union, or international agencies.

There were other significant proposals that had support among all or a strong majority of those present, and these and the accompanying discussions were very valuable to all of us who attended the consultation. We will be preparing a more complete report of our sessions, and will send you a copy of it. I would welcome any comments you might have, including suggestions for similar consultations in the future.

With best wishes,

JIMMY.

THOMAS R. NADEL, ARIZONA VOICE OF DEMOCRACY WINNER

HON. BOB STUMP

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. STUMP. Mr. Speaker, the 1984–85 Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, Voice of Democracy Scholarship Program Arizona winner is a young man from Sun City, AZ, Thomas R. Nadel.

I am including his winning entry entitled, "My Pledge to America," and hope that my colleagues will read it and share this inspirational composition with me.

The winning entry follows:

MY PLEDGE TO AMERICA

I believe in the United States of America as a country of the people, by the people, and for the people. Ours is a country established upon the principles of freedom, equality, justice, and humanity. These were the causes for which American patriots sacrificed their lives and fortunes. Therefore, it is indeed my pledge and duty to my country to love it, to support its Constitution, to obey its laws, to respect its flag and to defend it against all enemies. Yes, "My Pledge to America" is simply to serve her with pride and strive to make her more perfect.

There are many words in our language that denotes satisfaction with our country, but the greatest and the most animated is 'pride'. No one can deny what we feel as the flag passes by; or at the opening of sports festivities and the "Star Spangled Banner" is sung. Can anyone deny the feeling that comes over us? Why do we feel this way? The reason lies in the element of pride we feel towards this nation. For our sense of glory and respect evolves from the very root of our American government. Our system of government did not suddenly spring into being as at the wave of some political magician's wand. Nor was it pulled out of thin air by the Founding Fathers at Philadelphia. Rather, it has developed through long centuries of experience, tradition, thought and deed. Our forefathers were not thinking of the narrow present and of themselves alone. They recognized an obligation to keep freedom alive for all future Americans as well. The ideals they stated are positive and constructive. "My Pledge to America" is to uphold these ideals and thus oppose whatever divides this nation, leads to injustice, weakens our defense, undermines our physical or economic health and threatens our basic freedoms both now and forever.

Since time began we have had men who have come to the front with progressive ideas. These men have served their country with pride and now it is my generation's turn to do the same. Of course we know, that as the world grows the pressures increase upon us to react to the new ideas and methods that are constantly increasing and improving our daily life. One major question today is "What can our country look forward to ten or twenty years from now"? The answer to this question is to make America more perfect through universal peace and prosperity. For only the youth today can bring about the necessary changes to coincide with the progress of the years to come. Only the willingness of my generation to serve America with pride, can bring us the kind of future all the people of tomorrow will be using and experiencing. Yes, today's youth are the navigators for tomorrow, and the challenges facing us are as many as the mysteries that are constantly confronting America today. Thus "My Pledge to America" shall be accomplished through the knowledge, strength, and determination of my generation's answers to the important questions that are before America.

America's future is an undecided future. However, it is an open future; a future that my generation must and can create. Through our efforts we can work to eliminate such problems as starvation, sickness, and antagonism toward our neighbors, by keeping the ideals, values and goals characteristic of this nation ever alive.

In conclusion, it is indeed time for my generation to take action. For I see America where no man fears to think as he pleases or say what he thinks. I see America where no man is another man's master, where no man's mind is dark with fear. I see America as the horizon of human hopes. To those who say the design defies our abilities to complete it, I answer, "To act with enthusiasm and faith is the condition of acting great".

So, "My Pledge To America" is a very simple one. It is time we stopped talking about who is responsible for a hunger problem, or a crime problem, or an energy crisis and direct our energies toward finding a solution. I do not care who is at fault. It doesn't make one bit of difference. All I want and expect is for my generation to solve it. For we will make our nation stronger. We will make the United States of America more perfect, and "My Pledge to America" is to serve her with pride and always make her the greatest country on earth.

This is "My Pledge to America", so help me God! ●

REPEAL FUEL USE ACT AND INCREMENTAL PRICING

HON. DAN COATS

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. COATS. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I joined my colleague, Mr. SLATTERY of Kansas, as a cosponsor of legislation that would end two Federal programs which discourage industrial use of natural gas.

One of these two programs is the Powerplant and Industrial Fuel Use Act (FUA), which automatically prohibits the use of either gas or oil in most large new powerplants and industrial facilities. The other program is the incremental pricing program in title II of the Natural Gas Policy Act; this latter program requires that prices charged for gas used by certain industrial boilers must be set at rough parity with high-sulfur residual oil, even if the price of gas would otherwise be less than the price of residual oil.

Much has already been said about the negative effects of these programs. It has been said that restrictions on industrial use of natural gas, while perhaps defensible in the context of the tight supply situation that prevailed in 1978, now lack any rational foundation in light of the gas supply improvements that have occurred since that time. It has also been said that the incremental pricing program, by artificially reducing opportunities to displace imported oil with natural gas, flies in the face of the crucial goal of national energy self-sufficiency. It has been said as well that both of these programs, by artificially discouraging the use of America's cleanest-burning fossil fuel, run counter to the national objective of improving air quality at the lowest possible cost.

All of these criticisms are valid, but I would like to add another important criticism: The fact that retention of these programs is also contrary to the goal of sound recovery for the Nation's economy.

I come from northeastern Indiana, and I therefore know something about the continued need for economic growth. The road to many of our "smokestack" industries is a difficult one, but the road is made rockier still by the FUA and incremental pricing.

On this point, it cannot be stressed enough that the "smokestack" industries tend to be very energy-intensive. Because fuel costs are such a major factor in the efficiency of a "smokestack" company, the entirety of corporate operations can be negatively affected by Federal programs that artificially "tilt" fuel choices away from economically better options.

Frankly, "smokestack America" faces enough inherent obstacles to growth. America cannot afford the luxury of throwing in the additional obstacle of an artificial impediment that is based on long-outmoded assumptions.

When the price of natural gas falls below the price of residual oil, why should the Incremental Pricing Program remove any cost reductions that a company could otherwise achieve by switching to the cheaper fuel? Why should the Fuel Use Act require a company to seek a special regulatory exemption when it wants to put in a cost-efficient gas cogenerator at a new plant? For that matter, why should the same act prevent an electric utility from building a new, gas-fired combined cycle powerplant if that turns out to be cheapest and most efficient way to generate additional electricity for industrial and residential consumers?

It makes no sense for the Federal Government to ban or neutralize—or at best complicate—such options for improving our Nation's economic efficiency. Yet that is exactly what the Federal Government is doing, because those of us who serve in Congress have not yet "gotten around" to eliminating two programs that virtually all of us view as outmoded and nonsensical.

It's time to eliminate FUA and incremental pricing as quickly as we can—because any unnecessary obstacle to economic growth is one obstacle too many.●

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR DISTINGUISHED SERVICE AWARDS

HON. FRANK R. WOLF

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to my colleagues attention a number of Federal employees who will receive the Distinguished Service Award to be presented by the Department of the Interior at the 50th Departmental Honor Awards Convocation on Wednesday, April 24. I think this is another example of what I and a number of my colleagues have been saying about the Federal work force. The majority of civil servants are hard working, conscientious individuals who deserve the respect and support of not only this body, but also recognition from the public they serve. I insert the names and citations for their distinguished service at this point in the RECORD:

Raymond V. Butler—In recognition of his outstanding leadership and exceptional service to the Indian people and to the Bureau of Indian Affairs.

Franklin A. Edwards—In recognition of outstanding contributions to the Bureau of Land Management in the fields of natural resource management and public lands administration.

Eleanor R. Schwartz—In recognition of exceptional contributions to the Bureau of Land Management in its role as conservator of the Federal lands.

Richard R. Hite—In recognition of his outstanding professional contributions, initiatives, and performance in the fields of budget administration and executive management.

Andrew S. Adams—In recognition of his outstanding contributions as a special projects administrator for the Department of the Interior and as a staff assistant to the Assistant Secretary-Policy, Budget and Administration.

Douglas E. Henriques—In recognition of his exceptional contributions to the Department of the Interior in the field of public land law.

Aldon D. Nielson—In recognition of outstanding achievements in advancing water resource developments in the Bureau of Reclamation through the effective application of economic and management principles.

George E. Ericksen—In recognition of his exceptional achievements in the Geological Survey's mineral resource programs, especially in the field of foreign technical assistance.

Sam H. Patterson—In recognition of his many achievements in the investigations of mineral deposits and domestic and world resources of aluminum.

John A. Mattoon—In recognition of his outstanding career and achievements in increasing public understanding and support for the mission and goals of the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service.

Donald R. Tindal—In recognition of his courageous action in rescuing a person from drowning in the Gulf of Mexico.●

IN MEMORY OF DEWEY BRADFORD

HON. J.J. PICKLE

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. PICKLE. Mr. Speaker, recently, we lost Dewey Bradford, probably the most influential promoter of Southwestern art in the last 50 years. Dewey Bradford advanced the appreciation of Southwestern art and Texas art, in particular, more than any single individual in our time. In honor of Dewey, Cactus Pryor, noted Texas humorist, radio commentator, and admirer of Dewey, offered the following tribute to Dewey's life and work, and I would like to have it inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The tribute follows:

DEWEY BRADFORD

He was the Dean of Southwestern art. If God hadn't invented bluebonnets and cacti, Dewey Bradford would have. He discovered . . . he inspired . . . he drove . . . he sold . . . and, in many ways, he fathered Porfirio Salinas . . . Texas' most famous artist. But Dewey's artistic tastes transcended Texas landscapes. He was not just a regionalist in artistic appreciation, although he knew the importance of a region having it own art and artists. In many ways, Dewey Bradford was to Texas art what J. Frank Dobie was to folklore and John Lomax was to folk music.

Dewey's artistic soul was not limited to the canvas. He was an actor. He performed in the all-time Hollywood movie classic, Ben Hur. He also performed on canvas. Not as a painter . . . as a boxer. He was a Golden Glove champion. He was also an all Southwest Conference football player for the University of Texas. He was the originator of the Country Store Art Gallery. Bradford's Paint Company was his father's. Dewey cut his commercial teeth there.

But of all the multi talents of Dewey Bradford, perhaps his greatest was the ability to tell a story. He was a conversationalist. He painted portraits with words that Salinas could never touch. And many of Dewey's stories were of his high jinks. He was a pixie with an impish sense of humor. One of his old running mates was an Austinite right out of Damon Runyon . . . name of Rickie Kies. Rickie and Dewey had a code of honor. They would never pay admission into a sporting event. They would hoax their way in. There's no way you can get into a Texas-Arkansas football game without a ticket. But Dewey and Rickie did. At the gate Rickie fainted. Dewey, of course, was his doctor. And ordered the man to be taken to the Texas dressing room. There Doctor Bradford revived the poor man . . . and they joined the Texas football team in watching the game. I may not have my facts absolutely correct as to whom played which role. But Dewey would be the first to not allow the total truth to get in the way of the telling of a tale.

Dewey loved not only puncturing but even torturing the pompous. He would go to the registration desk of a plush hotel dressed as a derelict and ask for their best suite. When they would try to dissuade him, he would produce a large roll of bills and delight in their immediate turnabout.

He loved living. And when life was no longer fun, he was ready to go. And so Dewey Bradford did last Friday, after 88 rather amazing years.

NATIONAL HEMOPHILIA AWARENESS MONTH, MARCH 1986

HON. BILL GREEN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to bring my colleagues' attention to a House joint resolution I am introducing today which will make March 1986 "National Hemophilia Awareness Month." This bill will help to clarify some of the misconceptions the public has about hemophilia. At the present time, there is much fear among the public and hemophilia victims themselves about the correlation between hemophilia and acquired immuno-deficiency syndrome [AIDS].

Hemophilia is caused by an inactivity of one of the blood proteins necessary for clotting. It strikes mostly males of all races, nationalities, and economic levels. Although it is a genetic disease, a family history of hemophilia is not required to contract it. Hemophilia occurs in 1 of every 4,000 males. At present, there is no cure for hemophilia. Treatment, which causes the blood to clot temporarily, is very expensive.

Although a majority of the public believes that external bleeding causes hemophilia victims the most trouble, that is not the case. The major problem for hemophilia patients is internal bleeding, which can occur at any time without cause. That bleeding results in permanent change of muscles and joints and causes considerable pain.

Since November 20, 1983, 21 cases of AIDS have been identified among patients with hemophilia. Because hemophiliacs fear that donors may have AIDS, there has been a marked decline of hemophilia patients receiving clotting factor treatment. That action is dangerous, because the risk of damage to joints is greater than the risk of contracting AIDS. The National Hemophilia Association urges all hemophilia victims to continue clotting treatment.

There is also a fear among members of the public that by coming into contact with hemophilia patients they risk contracting AIDS. Currently, there are no data to prove such a theory.

National Hemophilia Awareness Month will educate the public about this disease. It will separate the facts from the myths about hemophilia. I therefore urge my colleagues to cosponsor this resolution and support all the activities and events that take place during National Hemophilia Awareness Month.●

TRIBUTE TO WILLIAM H. LAWRENCE

HON. DON EDWARDS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, along with my colleagues from California [Mr. MINETA, Mr. PANETTA, and Mr. ZSCHAU], I would like to pay tribute to William H. Lawrence, postmaster of San Jose, on the occasion of his retirement after 24 years of distinguished service.

Our good friend Bill took the reins as acting postmaster of San Jose in 1961. He was confirmed by the U.S. Senate in August 1962, after his appointment to the post by President John F. Kennedy. At that time there were 940 San Jose postal employees, 350 routes, delivery to 350,000 patrons, and mail volume of 900,000 pieces daily.

A quarter of a century later, the figures—which had fitted neatly on one sheet of paper—have extended well beyond the page with 3,320,800 pieces daily, 1,350 routes, and 592,222 deliveries. With growth came responsibility, and Bill now has line authority over 49 post offices in 4 counties, 4,577 employees, and 1.5 million customers.

Bill was born in San Jose, the son of a dentist who practiced here for 35 years. He attended Hester, Hoover, and San Jose High School before graduating with an A.B. in commerce from San Jose State College. In World War II, he was a 100-mission fighter pilot at Guadalcanal and elsewhere. After combat duty he served as a fighter pilot instructor at Perry Air Force Base, FL. He was awarded the Air Medal with four oak leaf clusters and two battle stars.

Toward the end of the war he married Betty Francis, a native of Los Gatos. The Lawrences have three children, Cheryl F., William H. III, and James E. He is the very proud grandfather of Caitlin (Katy). Bill and Betty have recently celebrated their 40th wedding anniversary.

For 17 years Bill worked in farm equipment sales and service and for 3 years as executive director of the Santa Clara County chapter of the National March of Dimes. Bill, who has always been active in the community, has served as past president of the Multiple Sclerosis Society, past president and current board member of the McKinnon School for Retarded Children, 8-year member of the Crippled Children's Society, and 7-year board member of the United Way, to list just a few organizations.

Possessed of a great wit, Bill is a speaker with anecdotal flair. He is hard, if not impossible, to beat in verbal contests, and is never at a loss to fill the air with good-natured barbs. While everyone else is recovering from laughter, again he will sally forth with more comments calculated to leave the listeners laughing all the harder.

Upon his retirement on May 3 as the longest serving postmaster of San Jose, we hope that Bill will be able to fully indulge in his hobbies of gardening, reading, experimental sculpturing, and jewelry making.

Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my colleagues, Mr. MINETA, Mr. PANETTA, and Mr. ZSCHAU, I ask the Congress to join us in extending our thanks to Bill for his fine service.

He will surely be missed as the postmaster of San Jose.●

CARDINAL TERENCE J. COOKE

HON. JOSEPH J. DioGUARDI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. DIOGUARDI. Mr. Speaker, at a time when the world is filled with poverty, starvation, war and despair, it is a pleasure for me to honor today, a man who gave his whole life to combating these tragedies, not just for New Yorkers but for the United States and the world as well. I am speaking of Cardinal Terence J. Cooke, the cardinal of New York from 1968 until his death in October 1983.

Cardinal Cooke was born in a slum tenement on Manhattan's upper west side. From his early childhood he wanted to be a priest. He pursued and reached that goal, and even after, as a priest, he gave himself completely to his Lord and to his people. For Cardinal Cooke, everything began with, and culminated in, the offering of the holy sacrifice. This was at the heart, the center, the very core of his being.

Cooke was ordained on December 1, 1945. He earned his MS degree in social work at Catholic University and he did additional graduate work in social service at the University of Chicago. He moved into the chancery office of the Roman Catholic archdiocese of New York as personal secretary to Francis Cardinal Spellman in January 1957, and he became vice-chancellor of the archdiocese in 1958 and chancellor in 1961.

He was a teacher of God's word and of the teaching of the church and Cardinal Cooke took with deep seriousness this responsibility. He carried it out with tact, fidelity and courage. He was ready to risk criticism and opposition, always confident that he was doing the work of the Lord.

As a cardinal, he accepted the title with his usual sense of responsibility. He was always ready at a moment's notice to journey anywhere in the world and to undertake any mission committed to him by the Holy Father. It was his task to guide the archdiocese of New York and he was able to guide his church faithfully through years of tension, conflict and trials.

Terence Cooke accepted his suffering from leukemia with complete patience and with complete trust in the will of God. During the last days he wrote "my illness is an opportunity of grace as the Lord makes it possible for me to participate in his passion and death."

Cardinal Terence Cooke may have been taken from us physically, but we are convinced that he remains with us in the communion of saints.●

SALVATION ARMY OF HARRISBURG CELEBRATES 100TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. GEORGE W. GEKAS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, 1985 marks the 100th anniversary of the Salvation Army in Harrisburg, PA. I would like to take this opportunity to single out this fine organization for the community service it provides.

The Harrisburg Citadel Corps of the Salvation Army was established in 1885, just 20 years after the organization was founded in London, England. In Dauphin County the Harrisburg Corps carries on its 100-year tradition of working where the need is greatest. The Harrisburg chapter provides youth recreation programs and is instrumental in providing emergency food, fuel, and shelter to the less fortunate.

I commend those individuals who have given so much to the people of Harrisburg through their untiring dedication to the premise to assist those who need it most, guided by their faith in God and love for all people.●

QUALITY EDUCATION ATTRACTS INDUSTRY

HON. ROY DYSON

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. DYSON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to submit for the RECORD an article written for the Cambridge Banner. This article addresses the relationship between the quality of education and industrial development. Dr. Scott Thomson, as reported by Mr. John Bray of the Banner staff, does an excellent job of making the case higher standards for teachers and principals and for bringing technology into our classrooms. A first-rate school system makes way for a first-rate economy.

QUALITY EDUCATION ATTRACTS INDUSTRY

(By John Bray)

EASTON.—The quality of an area's education system is playing a larger role in attracting industrial development and higher standards for teachers and school administrators will have to be met if education is to keep pace with society's demands.

That was part of this message Scott D. Thomson, executive secretary of the National Association of Secondary School Principals, left Friday with an audience of top education officials from across the state. Thomson was speaking at a conference in Easton to discuss the outlook for education for the next decade.

Thomson, a former superintendent, said the quality of an education system is playing an increasing role of industry, in the industrial development of an area. He cited the successful appeal by Mississippi's Governor to the state legislature for a large increase in education funding. Thomson said the governor was able last year to convince the legislature to provide more funds by linking economic development to improving the school system.

"We're dead economically if we don't get this through," Thomson said, recounting the politician's pitch.

Thomson cited similar efforts in other states.

An advertisement in Business Week magazine, a strong voice in the business community, reflected this trend, Thomson said. The ad came from the Orlando, Florida area and the second reason the ad cited to attract an industry was the claim of having an excellent public education system. The Florida location was the first.

Thomson said education came above traditional inducements such as a favorable labor climate and available housing.

Thomson said private industry is ahead of the general public in its recognization of the need to improve public education.

"Unless you have a first-rate school system, you can't have a first-rate economy," Thomson said.

Thomson said that in two years there would probably be a national proficiency exam for teachers or national bank of questions for states to chose from for an exam. He said proficiency exams for principals also are coming to help identify leaders.

Thomson said higher standards for teachers are needed. When asked if higher standards would further reduce an already shrinking pool of teachers. Thomson said that was a possibility. But he believes higher standards would attract teachers and lead to higher salaries.

State Schools Superintendent, David W. Hornbeck has called for a 25 percent increase in teachers' salaries above inflation. Asked Friday if that figure was realistic, Hornbeck said: "I don't know. The public will ultimately decide."

Thomson said that better use of classroom time would be needed to improve education.

"It's not enough to work harder," he said. "we have to work smarter as well."

Regarding technology in the classroom, Thomson said there has been "triumphant failures and remarkable successes," but said that "most efforts to date have had limited impact and effect."

But Thomson said in the near future computers will play an important role in helping students with remedial learning tasks.

"That's going to be a giant step forward," he said.

He said society has become more demanding of services and that public schools would have to meet those demands. Thomson cited "auxiliary" services such as preparation courses for standardized college admissions tests that schools should be providing or risk losing students to other organizations that provide them.

"As best you can, make sure you have those auxiliary services," he said. "You may not have needed it five years ago but you need it now."

Thomson said people believe they deserve the best product and "unless we have the best product we're not going to be in business."●

SHOULD CONGRESS APPROPRIATE $14 MILLION IN AID TO THE NICARAGUAN FREEDOM FIGHTERS?

HON. G. WILLIAM WHITEHURST

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. WHITEHURST. Mr. Speaker, we have heard a great deal on all sides of the question of sending aid to the freedom fighters in Nicaragua, and I do not wish to add to the plethora of rhetoric.

However, I would like to take this opportunity to share with my colleagues the result of a poll conducted by the Christian Broadcasting Network, Inc., on April 17, 1985. The Reverend M.G. Robertson, president, a constituent and good friend, sent me a copy of the CBN press release, and I earnestly hope that all of my colleagues will take note of the public's response to the question, "Should Congress appropriate $14 million in aid to the Nicaraguan Freedom Fighters?"

We would do well to follow the public's lead.

SHOULD CONGRESS APPROPRIATE $14 MILLION IN AID TO THE NICARAGUAN FREEDOM FIGHTERS?

On April 17, 1985 The CBN Cable Network and the "700 Club" television program conducted a TV audience poll in 50 states to cover 13,000 communities with the question, "Should Congress appropriate $14 million in aid to the Nicaraguan Freedom Fighters?"

The number of those responding was the highest in the network's history with the following results: 49,808 individual responses were recorded. From these 85% said yes that such an appropriation should be made. 15% said no that such an appropriation should not be made.

In the past, CBN has discovered that in such self-selection polls, we need to provide a 20% correction factor to bring the results in line with other nationally recognized polls such as Gallup or Roper. Such correction would reduce the YES vote to 65% and the NO vote to 35%, still over 2 to 1 in favor extrapolated to reflect the entire nation.●

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

HON. HAROLD ROGERS

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, on April 22, 1985, I was unavoidably absent when the House voted on House Resolution 125, a resolution to condemn the Soviet Government for the murder of Maj. Arthur D. Nicholson, Jr. Had I been present for this vote, I would have voted "aye."●

LEGISLATION TO ADD SECONDARY AND ELEMENTARY SCHOOL PRINCIPALS TO THE ASSESSMENT POLICY COMMITTEE

HON. DALE E. KILDEE

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. KILDEE. Mr. Speaker, today I, along with Mr. GOODLING, am introducing legislation to enhance the important task of assessing the achievement levels of children and young adults in the basic skills of reading, mathematics, and communication. Specifically, this measure would amend the General Education Provisions Act by formally including a secondary and an elementary school principal in the assessment policy committee [APC], a body established by Congress to help assess education policymaking at the local, State, and Federal level.

Congress mandated a national assessment of education progress when it enacted Public Law 95-561, the General Education Provisions Act [GEPA]. The APC is charged with the task of selecting the learning areas to be assessed, developing goals and assessment objectives, identifying appropriate methodology and ground rules for measuring educational progress and determining the form and content of the assessment's report, as well as the method of dissemination. The APC also conducts studies on how to improve the ultimate use of the national assessment.

Under current law, the APC is composed of 12 members: One chief State school officer, two State legislators, two school district superintendents, one chairman of a State board of education, one chairman of a local school board, one Governor of a State and four classroom teachers. This measure would provide for the inclusion of one secondary and one elementary school principal in the APC membership.

Principals set the learning climate, are the curriculum leaders and are the implementers of change in each school. They observe and assess the daily implementation of curricula. Secondary and elementary school principals would bring to the APC a much needed perspective of the everyday implementation and assessment of curricula. This legislation would afford the utilization of this perspective. I encourage Congress to join in recognizing the invaluable perspective secondary and elementary school principals can bring in assessing our education needs.●

THE DEATH OF SAM J. ERVIN, JR.

HON. W.G. (BILL) HEFNER

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. HEFNER. Mr. Speaker, with the death yesterday of former Senator Sam J. Ervin, Jr., this country lost a great American.

Over a lifetime, he served his community, State, and Nation with the utmost dedication and distinction.

He was a man who never ducked the hard decisions. He fought with great effectiveness for those ideals and principles in which he believed.

Sam Ervin was a constitutional and Biblical scholar who applied the principles of these two great documents to his decisions as a judge and legislator.

It is not for me at this time to attempt to record the many contributions made by Sam Ervin during a lifetime of public service. History will do this.

We will miss this great man of charm, wit, dedication, and intelligence.

To "Miss Margaret" and his family, we offer our deepest sympathy.●

DR. WALTER J. MOLO, JR.

HON. WILLIAM O. LIPINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. LIPINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I rise today before my colleagues to recognize and honor a distinguished educator from Illinois, Dr. Walter J. Molo, Jr. Currently the superintendent of the Lyons Township School District in the Fifth Congressional District, Dr. Molo will be retiring at the end of June after 35 years in education.

During his long career, Dr. Molo has accrued quite a long list of accomplishments; certainly his foresight into the future needs of his students is exemplified by the fact that while principal at Brentwood High School in Brentwood, MO, the high school became the first in St. Louis County to implement computer education as a required course.

Dr. Molo's all encompassing educational experience includes time spent as a teacher, elementary school principal, junior high school principal, elementary superintendent, high school superintendent, and district school superintendent. Outside of the classroom, he was president of the Lake Shore Division of the Illinois Elementary Principals Association and assisted in the organization of the Illinois Principals Association.

It is a pleasure for me to recognize before my colleagues a man whose devoted work in the field of education should be pointed out as exemplary. I join with residents of the Fifth Congressional District in paying tribute to Dr. Walter J. Molo, Jr., and thank him for his outstanding work on our behalf.●

THE 75TH ANNIVERSARY OF FRANKFORD HIGH SCHOOL

HON. ROBERT A. BORSKI

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. BORSKI. Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay special tribute to my own alma mater, Frankford High School, as it celebrates 75 years of educating young men and women in Philadelphia and preparing them for the challenges of life.

Founded with only 37 students and a staff of 1 teacher, Frankford has graduated over 35,000 students during the past three-quarters of a century. These graduates have entered all walks of life, and have distinguished themselves by their contributions to the advancement of our communities and our country.

If I were to name all of the outstanding citizens of our country who received their high school education at Frankford, the list would be virtually endless. However, to illustrate the diverse and wide-ranging careers encompassed by graduates of Frankford, and with apologies to others too numerous to mention, I would like to recognize some people who are among the prominent alumni of my school:

Mr. David Maxwell, Esq., past president of the American Bar Association and the late Lt. Comdr. J. Wesley Harvey, commander of the submarine U.S.S. Thresher; Dr. Virginia Lester, innovative college president of Mary Baldwin College, Staunton, VA, and Dr. Charles A. James, former U.S. Ambassador to Niger; Mr. D. Donald Jamieson, Esq., chairman of the Philadelphia Republican Party and Mr. Joseph S. Bonsal, lead singer of the enormously popular country group, the Oak Ridge Boys; Dr. Walter M. Levy, M.D. and Mr. Harold E. Kohn, Esq., both of whom have become outstanding members of their respective professional communities.

Today there are 2,250 students enrolled at Frankford. These students benefit not only from the comprehensive curriculum offered at Frankford, but also from the 75 yearlong tradition of excellence which has characterized the school. This tradition has been fostered by the six men who have served as principals: Dr. G. Alvin Snook, Mr. Thomas Moore, Dr. Frank L. Cloud, Mr. James A. Killough and now, Mr. James R. Peters. Because of their efforts, I know that among today's students at Frankford are some of our leaders of tomorrow.

On this occasion, Mr. Speaker, I look back to the opportunities which my education at Frankford gave to me. I congratulate the school on its distinguished record of achievement in educating students, and for its positive role in molding outstanding citizens preparing them for the challenges of life.●

A TRIBUTE TO PROFESSIONAL SECRETARIES

HON. NORMAN F. LENT

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. LENT. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join my colleagues in paying tribute to those members of the secretarial profession and their significant contributions to the public and private sectors of America's economy.

The professional secretary is the backbone of business, Government on all levels, industry, and nonprofit organizations. The secretary's competent and efficient management skills, careful execution of assignments, and coordination of everyday workflow within an office are crucial to the effective and smooth operation of any workplace. Furthermore, the secretary is a vital link of communication and public relations between the office and the rest of the business world and public in general.

Demonstrating excellence in many fields, secretaries have earned distinction of the highest regard for commitment and dedication to their careers.

As one who daily relies on my professional secretarial staff, I especially appreciate their valuable skills and experience as an important asset to my office. Finally, I commend my colleagues in the House of Representatives for their efforts in paying deserved recognition for the worthwhile contributions of the professional secretary.●

MR. PRESIDENT, DO NOT GO TO BITBURG

HON. ROBERT T. MATSUI

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. MATSUI. Mr. Speaker, I find it outrageous that on the 40th anniversary of the liberation of the Nazi concentration camps the administration is acting as though it has forgotten the lessons of that event. Mr. Reagan has repeated over and over again that "We Will Never Forget" but the President's visit to Bitburg gives his statement a hollow ring. I am appalled by his actions, and urge him not to visit the Bitburg cemetery.

Reconciliation and remembrance are not incompatible, but reconciliation cannot come at the expense of remembrance. By going to Bitburg Mr. Reagan dishonors those Germans who are working to build a democratic and free Germany. The SS troops buried at the Bitburg cemetery were not innocent victims of Nazism as Mr. Reagan would have us believe. They were Hitler's special breed of venom unleashed upon the world, the physical embodiment of humankind's darkest hour.

Buried at Bitburg are the Nazi troops who protected the rail lines to the concentration camps where 12 million innocent people were brutally murdered. Buried at Bitburg are the Nazi troops who fought and killed brave allied forces representing democracy, including tens of thousands of Americans. Buried at Bitburg is the hate and brutality that was Nazi Germany. The President of the United States should not pay his respects at Bitburg.

Mr. Speaker, I rise today in support of my colleagues resolution urging the President not go to Bitburg.●

GRASSLEY: IOWA'S GIPPER-BASHER

HON. BOB TRAXLER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. TRAXLER. Mr. Speaker, we have company in understanding that everything is not as wonderful as some would like us to believe.

The Detroit News ran a very interesting story by Evans and Novak recently which I believe needs to be read by all of our colleagues. It concerns one of our former colleagues in the House, now in the Senate—Iowa's Senator CHARLES GRASSLEY.

The article points out very poignantly that Senator GRASSLEY is doing what he was elected to do: represent his constituents. And he does this even though he has to oppose the leader of his own party, President Reagan, to do it.

While Senator GRASSLEY and I have different positions on a number of issues, I think we can all respect a man who shares our view that many of President Reagan's policies are not in the best interest of our Nation.

I encourage all of our colleagues to read this article, and I request that it be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

[From the Detroit News, Tuesday, April 16, 1985]

GRASSLEY: IOWA'S "GIPPER-BASHER"

(By Rowland Evans and Robert Novak)

SIOUX CITY, Iowa.—The Farm Belt fallout of Ronald Reagan's budget austerity and political hard-nose is Sen. Charles Grassley spending his Easter recess bashing the president.

The conservative Republican's Tuesday in Sioux City began with Chrysler dealer Charles Zook introducing him to a businessman's breakfast by saying: "Chuck Grassley represents Iowa, not the White House." For the next 10 hours, the senator did his best to prove that.

Amid non-stop criticism of a wide range of administration policies, Grassley had almost nothing good to say about Mr. Reagan (save for one fleeting acknowledgement that his policies had brought the Soviets back to the nuclear bargaining table) and absolutely nothing bad whatever to say about Democrats. That song elicits bravos, not boos, in Iowa today—not even a hint of disapproval during continuous contact with voters here.

Grassley's rising popularity—as the president's falls—in the state of his young manhood spells the folly of threatened White House reprisals against the senator's re-election campaign next year. But more significantly, it points to the political futility of the administration's semi-austerity program designed by Budget Director David Stockman.

Stockman's attempt to cut farm price supports in the midst of rural deflation only drove erstwhile strong (78 percent) Reagan-backer Grassley into near-total opposition on budget votes from defense to school loans. When White House aides threatened political reprisals, the senator responded with what Meredith Willson called "Iowa stubborn" in the The Music Man.

Since the threats, Grassley has not flinched and nobody at the White House has tried to make up. He broke party lines to oppose the MX missile, may vote against aid to the Nicaraguan freedom fighters, and, as a Finance Committee member, exhibits precious little enthusiasm for the Reagan tax reform.

"I have had no trouble with the president," he told the Sioux City Press Club. "The people in the White House have had trouble with me." But not much about Mr. Reagan satisfies him. "The president has been part of the problem up to now, because he didn't have the guts to take on Social Security and thinks defense is a sacred cow."

The Pentagon's cutoff of payments to General Dynamics, long a Grassley target, won faint praise. In an interview with

KCAU-TV, he called it "two years too late" and expressed doubt "there will be adequate follow-up."

Singles Gipper-bashing became doubles when Gov. Terry Branstad, another conservative Republican whose political stock has risen since he broke with the administration, testified before. Grassley's one-man Senate Judiciary Subcommittee hearing here. Thousands of financially ruined Iowa farmers "would have made it if the administration had kept its word" about guaranteeing farm credit, the governor testified. "I urge you, Chuck, to build pressure in Congress to force the administration to keep its word."

Nobody came to the administration's defense. Instead, as the subcommittee hearing began, Grassley was presented with a handwritten letter signed by 56 voters urging him not to bow to "political pressure . . . from the president to change your views." He is not about to. The procession of voters who volunteered to him that they will vote for him in 1986 for the first time suggests Grassley will surmount Iowa's economic misery to become one of the state's infrequent two-term senators.

Grassley's Gipper-bashing permits him to steer clear of the debris from Republican political deterioration in the Farm Belt. "These are people I voted for," a distraught Jim Sheehan, president of the Farmers Savings Bank in Pierson and a self-described Republican, testified at Grassley's hearing in expressing his dismay over the Reagan administration.

He was more graphic in private. "I've had it with the Republicans," he told us, adding that "(Paul) Volcker (Federal Reserve chairman) and Reagan may go down as two of the most hated men in history." Those passionate words buttress Chuck Grassley's attitude and mean grave political trouble for the president and his party in the Farm Belt.●

MILITARY SPENDING IS THE DEFICIT CULPRIT

HON. GEORGE MILLER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, we are now engaged once again in a debate over how to craft a Federal budget, and how to control spending in order to reduce the $200 billion deficit.

As a member of the Budget Committee of this House, I have participated in a line-by-line review of Federal spending. The Budget Committee has also conducted a detailed analysis of the budget recommendations proposed by the President and recently approved by the U.S. Senate Budget Committee. And I think that, before the House launches its own budget process for fiscal 1986, we ought to make a couple of very important points about where the fat is in the budget, and where we should look for cuts.

For the fifth year in a row, the administration called for massive domestic cuts—way out of proportion to the size of domestic spending in the budget as a whole. The President, in fact, proposed that we cut over $65 billion in domestic discretionary spending over the next 3 years, nearly the same amount as we cut in 1981 and 1982.

You would think, from those recommendations, that domestic spending was the culprit responsible for the deficits, which, of course, have continued to grow even though we have made—often excessively—the radical cuts in low-income and domestic spending demanded by President Reagan.

But a careful examination of the figures leads to a different conclusion.

Between fiscal 1980 and the levels projected for the fiscal 1986 budget, as contained in the President's latest "Rose Garden" plan, national defense has risen from 5.2 percent of gross national product [GNP] to 6.6 percent—a cumulative dollar increase of over $142 billion for the military in 6 years. By contrast, nondefense discretionary programs have dropped from 6 percent to 4.1 percent of GNP from 1980 to 1986.

The President, of course, tried to pretend that he cut the military budget this year. But his cut was a fraud. It wasn't based on the real level of Pentagon spending, but on the level which Mr. Reagan had proposed last year—but which the Congress rejected. Compared to the real world defense spending, Mr. Reagan's 1986 request was a $34 billion increase.

If the administration cannot tell a "cut" from a $34 billion increase, I am not surprised that their budgets have nearly tripled the annual deficit since taking office in 1981.

Now, since 1980, the military budget has increased by $142 billion, including the $24.1 billion recently requested by the administration. The cumulative increase in domestic, nondiscretionary programs, which the administration loves to blame for the deficit, has been just $15.4 billion.

The percentage increase for defense has been 106 percent, while the increase for domestic programs has been 9.9 percent. So, spending on military programs has been 10 times that of domestic programs. Yet the administration and the Senate continue to blame the deficit on domestic programs and call for them to take enormous additional cuts.

A $15.4 billion increase for domestic programs; $142.1 billion increase in military. The projected military budget for 1986 is $276.1 billion, while domestic programs is $170.2 billion. And yet the President would try to have us believe that domestic spending is to blame.

Over the course of the last few weeks, I have met with constituents and organizations about the budget and the need to reduce the deficit. Farmers, city officials, environmentalists, even the representatives of the poor have told me they are willing to make sacrifices. They are willing to do their part to drop down the deficit and improve the economic future of this Nation.

Nearly every single interest. Except the Pentagon. They can't lose a dime without "endangering our national security."

We've all heard about the $400 hammers and $600 toilet seats. The cost overruns. The free tax ride for military contractors. The padded bills. The overcharging on spare parts. I think the public is wise to what's going on, and they are demanding fiscal accountability at the Pentagon.

And the figures I have revealed here today demonstrate why the public is absolutely right: Because the Pentagon has never shared in the sacrifice. It has enjoyed huge increase in spending while everyone else—and especially the very poorest in this Nation—have learned to live with less. While the rest of us have become austere, the Pentagon has completely lost control of its spending.

We need a strong national defense—a defense second to none. But we don't need waste, abuse, and excess. We will not have a lean and efficient Pentagon, and we will not be able to control the soaring deficit, until we demand of the military the same conscientious cost control that we have demanded of everyone else.●

A TRIBUTE TO THE BERGEN COUNTY VOLUNTEERS OF ALTERNATIVES TO DOMESTIC VIOLENCE PROGRAM

HON. MARGE ROUKEMA

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mrs. ROUKEMA. Mr. Speaker, today we pay tribute to the many volunteers of the Alternatives to Domestic Violence Program of Bergen County, NJ. The Alternatives to Domestic Violence Program is a shining example of the spirit of the community providing services which previously fell solely to the government bureaucracy.

Studies indicate that 50 million persons annually suffer at the hand of another family member. It is because of this tragic reality that programs such as Alternatives to Domestic Violence must exist. How lucky Bergen County is to have ADV in operation.

Administered by the county department of health services, ADV is designed to reduce and eliminate instances of violence in the home through a combination of agency referral, community education, family counseling, effective treatment and, when necessary, intervention. The program serves over 200 clients in counseling and takes over 600 inquiries per month on its telephone hotline.

Certainly, Alternatives to Domestic Violence is to be applauded for its impressive record of community service. However, the program's accomplishments become even more laudable when one considers the depth of voluntary community support that has allowed this effort to continue effectively.

Five years ago, as the Federal Government began its important deficit reduction efforts, this program and similar programs across the Nation were affected. While some efforts were abandoned others were determined to survive to meet the challenge before them, ADV displayed the ingenuity that has long typified America. By tapping the same spirit of voluntarism that built this Nation. ADV developed a system of paraprofessional personnel that allowed that program to flourish and grow.

My colleagues, today as we recognize the success of Alternatives for Domestic Violence, it is also fitting that we pay tribute to the volunteers who have contributed generously of themselves to work the telephone hotlines, perform counseling, handle clerical duties, and educate the community.

With their efforts, these men and women are living examples of the spirit fundamental to American community and neighborhood life. As volunteers they are willing to accept responsibility for one another's well-being.

Indeed, the volunteers of Alternatives for Domestic Violence provide living testimony that the spirit of voluntarism is alive in Bergen County. For that, I thank them and transmit the thanks of the county, the State, and, indeed, the Nation.●

HON. JIM SLATTERY

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. SLATTERY. Mr. Speaker, along with my distinguished colleague, DAN COATS of Indiana, I have introduced H.R. 2185, which will repeal certain sections of the Powerplant and Industrial Fuel Use Act of 1978 and repeal the incremental pricing requirements of the Natural Gas Policy Act of 1978.

The Fuel Use Act and the NGPA were enacted at a time when the prevailing wisdom was that natural gas was a rapidly depleting resource whose future was limited. Looking back at the statistics available in 1978, such a perception may have been warranted. A decade of artificially low wellhead prices imposed by the Federal Government on gas in interstate commerce had stimulated demand and production from already-discovered reserves, while discouraging exploration and development of new supply. The results were a rapid reduction in natural gas reserves from a 1967 peak of about 293 trillion cubic feet [Tft^3] to a 1977 level of 207 Tft^3, accompanied by massive shortages closing factories and schools throughout the industrial Northeast and Midwest in the winter of 1976-77.

The Powerplant and Industrial Fuel Use Act was passed to prohibit new large electric generation units and new large industrial boilers from using gas, oil or petroleum products as a primary fuel source. In addition, the Fuel Use Act originally would have required existing powerplants using such fuels to convert to an alternative source by 1990. This provision was eliminated in 1981. Such prohibitions may have made sense, given the expectation of continuing shortages that was held by most policymakers at that time. Today, when we realize that gas resources are far more extensive than originally perceived, such prohibitions clearly are unnecessary.

Title II of the Natural Gas Policy Act sought to limit the attractiveness of natural gas use by certain large industrial users by incrementally pricing their gas use at the level of No. 6 crude oil. Title II has been a classic example of economic theory that has been ineffective in practice. The theory held that allocating a large portion of the increased costs of gas to large industrial users would give them the clout to ensure that overall prices would not rise too quickly. In addition, to the extent prices rose, incremental pricing was intended to shelter residential users. Neither assumption was true. Instead, prices for all users—residential, commercial, and industrial—rose until market forces prevented further increases. Incremental pricing operates today only to limit the opportunity to replace foreign oil with domestic natural gas. This is contrary to our energy and national security interests.

Producers of natural gas, pipelines, distributors, industrial users and residential consumers are all hurt by the prohibitions and disincentives of the Fuel Use Act and incremental pricing. A drop in industrial demand affects both supply and residential prices, because local gas companies must spread fixed system costs over a lesser base of volumes sold. Thus, every additional industrial or powerplant user lowers the costs borne by all other customers.

The loss of industrial users is not merely hypothetical. It is happening every day. Throughout the early 1970's, new gas-fired industrial boilers represented between 44 percent and 65 percent of the total capacity of new boilers manufactured, as reported to the American Boiler Manufacturers Association. The gas shortages of the mid-1970's resulted in a drop to around 27 percent. Despite the vastly improved gas supply, gas-fired boilers currently are only about 17 percent of total capacity.

The prohibitions and disincentives of the Fuel Use Act and incremental pricing are wasteful. Promising new technologies developed in this country such as gas-fired combined-cycle generators are far more efficient than traditional methods of generating electricity and are being used in Japan. Such technology is prohibited here. These prohibitions and disincentives also reduce opportunities for use of our cleanest burning fossil fuel. Increased use of natural gas, either alone or in conjunction with other fuels, could substantially reduce emissions of smog producing hydrocarbons, SO_x and particulate matter.

The continued implementation of the Fuel Use Act and incremental pricing requirements will maintain economic inefficiencies that these statutes have imposed on the marketplace. Investments in facilities designed to burn fuel other than natural gas, in instances where a gas-fired facility would be less expensive, are inefficient and wasteful. For example, a "worst case" analysis published by the American Gas Association on August 31, 1984, indicates that retention of the Fuel Use Act through the year 2000 could require $44 billion in unneeded capital investments or, alternatively, could result in the loss of 1.5 million domestic jobs.

The text of the bill follows:

H.R. 2185

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE; TABLE OF CONTENTS.

(a) IN GENERAL.—This act may be cited as the "Natural Gas Utilization Act of 1985".

(b) TABLE OF CONTENTS.—

SEC. 1. Short title; table of contents.
SEC. 2. Findings and purposes.
SEC. 101. Repeal of certain sections of the Powerplant and Industrial Fuel Use Act of 1978.
SEC. 102. Repeal of incremental pricing requirements.
SEC. 103. Effective date.

SEC. 2. Findings and Purposes.

(a) FINDINGS.—The Congress finds that—

(1) natural gas is an important element of interstate commerce because of its widespread residential, industrial, and commercial use;

(2) natural gas resources are far more extensive than was assumed when legislation was enacted in 1978 to limit natural gas use;

(3) increased use of natural gas provides national benefits in the form of lower prices due to spreading fixed costs of natural gas pipelines and distribution companies over a broader base, reduced capital expenditures for new electric powerplants and industrial facilities, and reduced atmospheric emissions of pollutants; and

(4) current federal legislation prohibits or discourages use of natural gas by industrial facilities or electric powerplants.

(b) PURPOSES.—The purposes of this Act are to—

(1) remove the legislative barriers now prohibiting or discouraging natural gas use; and

(2) allow choices of which energy source is to be used to be made by market forces.

SEC. 101. REPEAL OF CERTAIN SECTIONS OF THE POWERPLANT AND INDUSTRIAL FUEL USE ACT OF 1978.

(a) IN GENERAL.—The following sections of the Powerplant and Industrial Fuel Use Act of 1978 are repealed—

(1) section 103 (a)(16), (a)(18), and (a)(19) (42 U.S.C. 8302 (a)(16), (a)(18), and (a)(19));

(2) title II (42 U.S.C. 8311-8324);

(3) section 302 (42 U.S.C. 8342);

(4) section 401 (42 U.S.C. 8371);

(5) section 402 (42 U.S.C. 8372); and

(6) section 405 (42 U.S.C. 8375).

(b) CLERICAL AMENDMENT.—The table of contents in section 101(b) of the Powerplant and Industrial Fuel Use Act of 1978 is amended by striking out the items relating to the provisions repealed by subsection (a) (2) through (6) of this section.

(c) CONFORMING AMENDMENTS.—(1) Section 102 of the Powerplant and Industrial Fuel Use Act of 1978 (42 U.S.C. 8301) is amended by striking out "and major fuel-burning installations" and "and new" whenever such terms appear.

(2) Section 103 of the Powerplant and Industrial Fuel Use Act of 1978 (42 U.S.C. 8302) is amended—

(A) in subsection (a)(13)(B), by—

(i) striking out clause (ii)(III);

(ii) striking out "; or" at the end of clause (ii)(II), and inserting a period in its place; and

(iii) inserting "and" at the end of clause (ii)(I);

(B) in subsection (a)(15), by striking out "or major fuel-burning installation" and "or new";

(C) in subsection (a)(20), by striking out "or major fuel-burning installation";

(D) by redesignating subsections (a)(17), (a)(20), (a)(21), (a)(22), (a)(23), (a)(24), (a)(25), (a)(26), (a)(27), (a)(28), and (a)(29) as subsections (a)(16), (a)(17), (a)(18), (a)(19), (a)(20), (a)(21), (a)(22), (a)(23), (a)(24), (a)(25), and (a)(26);

(E) in subsection (b), by striking out "or major fuel-burning installation" wherever such term appears;

(F) in subsection (b)(1)(D), by striking out everything after "synthetic gas involved" and inserting in its place a period; and

(G) by striking out subsection (b)(3), and redesignating subsection (b)(4) as subsection (b)(3).

(3) The text of section 104 of the Powerplant and Industrial Fuel Use Act of 1978 (42 U.S.C. 8303) is amended to read as follows:

"The provisions of this Act shall apply in all the States, Puerto Rico, and the territories and possessions of the United States.".

(4) Section 303 of the Powerplant and Industrial Fuel Use Act of 1978 (42 U.S.C. 8343 is amended—

(A) by striking out "or installation" and "or installations" wherever such terms appear;

(B) by striking out "or 302";

(C) by striking out subsection (a)(3);

(D) by amending subsection (b)(1) to read as follows: "(1) The Secretary may prohibit, by rule, the use of natural gas or petroleum under section 301(b) in existing electric powerplants"; and

(E) by amending the last sentence of subsection (b)(3) to read as follows: "Any such rules shall not apply in the case of any existing electric powerplant with respect to which a comparable prohibition was issued by order.".

(5) Section 403 of the Powerplant and Industrial Fuel Use Act of 1978 (42 U.S.C. 8373) is amended by striking out—

(A) in subsection (a)(1), ", major fuel-burning installation, or other unit" and ", installation, or unit";

(B) in subsection (a)(2), ", installation, or other unit" and ", installation, or unit";

(C) in subsection (a)(2), the last sentence; and

(D) subsection (a)(3).

(6) Section 404 of the Powerplant and Industrial Fuel Use Act of 1978 (42 U.S.C. 8374) is amended by striking out—

(A) in subsection (c), "new or" in the phrase "applicable to any new or existing electric powerplant"; and

(B) subsection (g).

(7) Section 701 of the Powerplant and Industrial Fuel Use Act of 1978 (42 U.S.C. 8411) is amended by striking out—

(A) in the last sentence of subsection (b), "or installation";

(B) subsection (c);

(C) in the title of subsection (d), "AND EXEMPTIONS";

(D) in the first sentence of subsection (d)(1), "or any petition for any order granting an exemption (or permit)";

(E) in subsection (d)(1)(B), "or in the consideration of such petition";

(F) in subsection (f), "or a petition for an exemption (or permit) under this Act (other than under section 402 or 404),"; and

(G) subsection (g).

(8) Section 702 of the Powerplant and Industrial Fuel Use Act of 1978 (42 U.S.C. 8412) is amended by striking out—

(A) in the title of subsection (a), "OR EXEMPTION";

(B) in subsection (a), "or granting an exemption (or permit)";

(C) subsection (b), and redesignating subsection (c) as subsection (b);

(D) in the first sentence of subsection (b)(1) (as redesignated), "or by the denial of a petition for an order granting an exemption (or permit) referred to in subsection (b),";

(E) in the first sentence of subsection (b)(1) (as redesignated), "such rule, order, or denial is published under subsection (a) or (b)" and inserting in its place "such rule or order is published under subsection (a)";

(F) in the first sentence of subsection (b)(2) (as redesignated), "the rule, order, or denial" and inserting in its place "the rule or order";

(G) in the second sentence of subsection (b)(2) (as redesignated), "(or denial thereof)"; and

(H) in subsection (b)(3) (as redesignated), "any such rule, order, or denial" and inserting in its place "any such rule or order".

(9) Section 711 of the Powerplant and Industrial Fuel Use Act of 1978 (42 U.S.C. 8421) is amended by striking out in the first sentence of subsection (a), "or major fuel-burning installation".

(10) Section 721 of the Powerplant and Industrial Fuel Use Act of 1978 (42 U.S.C. 8431) is amended by striking out subsection (c) and redesignating subsection (d) as subsection (c).

(11) Section 723 of the Powerplant and Industrial Fuel Use Act of 1978 (42 U.S.C. 8433) is amended by striking out subsection (b) and redesignating subsections (c) and (d) as subsections (b) and (c).

(12) Section 731 of the Powerplant and Industrial Fuel Use Act of 1978 (42 U.S.C. 8441) is amended by striking out—

(A) "or major fuel-burning installation" wherever the phrase appears; and

(B) "title II or" in subsection (a)(1) and (g)(3).

(13) Section 745 of the Powerplant and Industrial Fuel Use Act of 1978 (42 U.S.C. 8455) is amended by striking out in the first sentence of subsection (a), "from new and existing electric powerplants and major fuel-burning installations" and inserting in its place "from existing electric powerplants".

(14) Section 761 of the Powerplant and Industrial Fuel Use Act of 1978 (42 U.S.C. 8471) is amended by striking out—

(A) in subsection (a), "any existing or new electric powerplant or major fuel-burning installation" and inserting in its place "any existing electric powerplant"; and

(B) in subsection (b)—

(i) "new or" in the phrase "In the case of any new or existing facility"; and

(ii) "except to the extent provided under section 212(b) or section 312(b)" and the comma immediately preceding that phrase.

SEC. 102. REPEAL OF INCREMENTAL PRICING REQUIREMENTS.

(a) REPEALER.—Title II of the Natural Gas Policy Act of 1978 (15 U.S.C. 3341-3348) is repealed.

(b) TECHNICAL AND CONFORMING AMENDMENTS.—

(1) Section 121(b) of such Act (15 U.S.C. 3331(b)) is amended—

(A) by striking out "Effective beginning on the effective date of the incremental pricing rule required under section 201, the" and inserting in lieu thereof "The"; and

(B) by striking out "shall cease to apply" and inserting in lieu thereof "shall not apply".

(2) Section 502 of such Act (15 U.S.C. 3412) is amended by striking out subsection (d).

(3) Section 504(b) of such Act (15 U.S.C. 3414(b)) is amended—

(A) by striking out paragraph (3) and redesignating subsequent paragraphs accordingly;

(B) in paragraph (1), by striking out "paragraphs (2) and (3)" and inserting in lieu thereof "paragraph (2)"; and

(C) in paragraph (3) (as redesignated), by striking out "paragraph (1), (2), or (3)" and inserting in lieu thereof "paragraph (1) or (2)".

(4) Section 506 of such Act (15 U.S.C. 3416) is amended by striking out subsection (b).

(5) Section 507(a) of such Act (15 U.S.C. 3417(a)) is amended by inserting "and" at the end of paragraph (1), by striking out "; and" at the end of paragraph (2) and inserting a period in lieu thereof, and by striking out paragraph (3).

(6) Section 507(c) of such Act (15 U.S.C. 3417(c)) is amended by striking out paragraph (3).

(7) Section 601(c)(2) of such Act (15 U.S.C. 3431(c)(2)) is amended—

(A) by striking out "—(A)" and inserting in lieu thereof a comma;

(B) by striking out "and" at the end of former subparagraph (A); and

(C) by striking out "(B) such recovery is not inconsistent with any requirement of any rule under section 201 (including any amendment under section 202),".

(8) The table of contents for such Act is amended by striking out the items relating to title II.

(c) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The repeal and amendments made by this section shall apply—

(1) with respect to requirements made applicable under section 201 of the Natural Gas Policy Act of 1978, any costs incurred by interstate pipelines after the effective date of this Act; and

(2) with respect to any requirements which may be construed to be applicable under section 202 of the Natural Gas Policy Act of 1978, any costs of an interstate pipeline, whenever incurred.

SEC. 103. EFFECTIVE DATE.

Except as otherwise expressly provided, the amendments made by this Act shall take effect on the first day of the first calendar month beginning more than 10 days after the date of the enactment of this Act and shall apply to deliveries on or after the first day of such calendar month.●

IF INTELSAT AIN'T BROKE, DON'T FIX IT

HON. AL SWIFT

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. SWIFT. Mr. Speaker, beginning with the 1962 Satellite Act, the U.S. Congress established policy that encouraged other nations to join with us in building a global satellite communications system, Intelsat. This international cooperative venture now provides high-quality, low-cost communication service throughout the world. Financial and technical resources have been pooled. rates are equalized so that even the poorer, less-developed nations can participate—and benefit. Today this system serves its 109 member nations as well as more than 60 other nations and territories, carrying two-thirds of the world's international communications traffic.

That's what we did and it's working beautifully.

As the driving force behind the creation of Intelsat, the United States gets the credit. And it is one of our truly successful foreign policy ventures. We are seen as the patron saint and defender of a system that serves everyone equally.

Or at least we were. Nearly 2 years ago, the administration began to consider changing national policy unilaterally to allow competition to Intelsat. That sounds fine at first, but there are strong policy reasons to not harm Intelsat. The President's own recommendation stresses the risk to U.S. interests if Intelsat is harmed by the introduction of competition.

The parallel with dismantling our own telephone system is striking. In that instance, all we set out to do was to introduce a little competition into the phone system. And we ended up with higher rates, divestiture, and a system that consumers and the industry alike are still trying to figure out.

That's what happened here at home with our phone system and there are good reasons to believe we're about to do the same thing all over again, this time on a global scale. The cliché "if it ain't broke don't fix it" has been used so often to describe what has happened with the domestic telephone problems that one would think it had been written for it alone. Now, the same phrase is being applied in the debate over whether to allow competition to Intelsat, most recently in an article in the business section of Monday's Washington Post. For any of my colleagues who may not have seen this article by Jerry Knight, I ask unanimous consent that the article be reprinted in today's RECORD.

The article follows:

INTELSAT AIN'T BROKE

(By Jerry Knight)

All that most people in Washington know about Intelsat is that they don't like the new headquarters it is building next to the University of the District of Columbia on upper Connecticut Avenue.

That ignorance about the international telecommunications satellite organization—and perhaps the antipathy towards its Eurotech architecture—helps explain why the United States is promoting a plan that threatens the efficiency of the worldwide communications system.

The same specious economic and political arguments that have led us to screw up our own phone system are now being advanced by Reagan administration officials who want to tinker with Intelsat.

Intelsat isn't broken, but Federal Communications Commission Chairman Mark Fowler wants to fix it anyway.

Fix it just like we've fixed the phone system—with higher rates, poorer service and complicated choices of equipment and carriers that most people would just as soon avoid.

Dramatic increases in phone bills are all that most ordinary consumers are getting from breaking up the Bell System and opening up the phone business to free-for-all competition. Dramatic increases in worldwide communications costs are all that most countries will get if the United States proceeds to let private companies compete with Intelsat.

Intelsat now has a monopoly on international satellite communications services. Telephones, television, data transmission and virtually all other high-tech communications services are or can be provided by Intelsat. The 109 member nations of the consortium route all their transoceanic calls, much of their international traffic and some of their domestic business via Intelsat. Regional multinational satellite systems in Europe, the Middle East and the Pacific handle some local needs but do not compete with Intelsat's bread-and-butter business.

The Reagan administration is moving to end Intelsat's monopoly by recommending the FCC license several U.S. firms to offer international satellite communications services. Orion Satellite Corp.—a Washington outfit with no track record—has led the lobbying for the FCC approval. Several other firms are pushing hard for what they see as a license to steal the most lucrative parts of Intelsat's business.

The U.S. entrepreneurs are not asking for the right to compete to provide satellite phone service to Zambia, they want only to be able to compete for high density, high profit business like transmitting transatlantic computer signals.

There is no question that private enterprise could provide some services more cheaply. In the same way that a supermarket subsidizes its loss leaders by charging higher prices for some staples, Intelsat uses profits from its most attractive routes to pay for serving obscure corners of the Third World.

The Bell System used the same cross-subsidy technique to build the world's finest telephone system for the United States, providing low-cost, universal phone service to isolated farms as well as urban areas. We've always known—when we bothered to think about it—that it costs more to put a phone up a hollow in West Virginia than to add another extension in Georgetown. But we gladly paid the secret subsidy, knowing the nation as a whole benefited.

With the breakup of the Bell System, those cross subsidies are ending. Long-distance rates which used to cover much of the loss on local service are coming down because MCI and others who offer only long-distance calling can provide that service for a lot less than Ma Bell used to charge. Without long-distance revenues to subsidize local service, local rates are exploding. Residential consumers face even more rate hikes because the phone company is losing once-lucrative business customers to its competitors.

The same thing is certain to happen to Intelsat, despite assurances to the contrary from Fowler and the White House.

In recommending the FCC action, the White House also urged "that the integrity and economic viability of Intelsat should be protected."

You can't do both, contends former FCC commissioner Abbott Washburn, one of the few people to speak out on the Intelsat issue who doesn't have a personal or financial interest in the outcome.

The administration contends that Intelsat can be protected by limiting the kinds of services its competitors can offer. Keeping the competitors isolated will be technologically and politically impossible, respond Intelsat and its supporters.

Warning a congressional committee last week of the weakness of the administration's promised protection, Washburn said, "My own view is that as a safety net for Intelsat, it is made of cheesecloth."

Ideology seems to be the force behind the effort to let U.S. companies compete with Intelsat. The ayatollahs of competition-at-any-cost are demanding the U.S. private sector get a piece of the international satellite action, even if the rest of the world has to pay for it.

The rest of the world is responding with outrage at what most other countries see as the greedy gringos attacking the most successful example of international cooperation. The United States is getting a bad rap around the world.

The advocates of Intelsat competition seem to have forgotten how the United States built the finest telecommunications system in history. It was a government-regulated monopoly that gave America low-cost, universal telephone service, not competition between rival phone companies. If that system was good enough for the United States, it ought to be good enough for the rest of the world.●

ORGAN DONOR AWARENESS WEEK

HON. CHARLES W. STENHOLM

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. STENHOLM. Mr. Speaker, I come today to commend my colleagues who have joined in supporting National Organ Donor Awareness Week, which we recognize this week. I also heartily commend the many citizens and organziations who will take this opportunity to spread the word of how we all can "make a miracle."

We have all heard on the news the pleas by desperate families with sad-eyed children who must have organ transplants if they are to live. We have had our hearts warmed by the success stories when people are given a second chance at life because of an organ transplant. But we seldom see the stories about the children for whom time ran out—the children who should have lived, could have lived, but never received the organs they needed.

I know about the heartbreak, the frustration, the sense of helplessness because I shared that experience with a small child, Ashley Bailey, and her family who live in my district. Born with biliary artesia, Ashley fought for more than a year to hold on to life until a proper liver could be located for transplantation. During that time there surely were many potential donors who could have shared life with Ashley. But like millions of Americans, their families were not aware of the need for organ donors, and tragically, Ashley died waiting. During 1984, only an estimated 3,000 out of 23,000 potential donors actually donated their organs and tissues. That means that in addition to the loss of the potential donors' lives, thousands of waiting recipients met death needlessly.

It's obvious that organ donation helps save and improve the lives of others. What is sometimes less obvious is that donation can diminish the suffering and grief caused by the sudden, unexpected death of the donor. In a tragedy that seems meaningless, organ donation can provide some meaning for the grieving survivors.

Medical technology has given us the ability to do miraculous things, but that can occur only if each individual makes the miracle happen. With the memory of all those individuals who never received the transplants they needed, and for the sake of all the people who will yet need transplants in the future, I urge each Member of Congress to take this opportunity to encourage all constituents to sign donor cards and notify their friends and relatives of their desire to "make a miracle."●

INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT

HON. DONALD J. PEASE

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. PEASE. Mr. Speaker, in many parts of our country, there is a lot of talk these days about industrial development—about the need to attract new factories, new employers.

Recently, the Trade Subcommittee of the House Ways and Means Committee visited an industrial park that would have made the heads of job-hungry Americans spin. It was clean, bright, completely modern, well-landscaped, and occupied by literally dozens of U.S. firms.

Unfortunately, it was in Juarez, Mexico, just across the border from El Paso, TX. Hundreds of American companies have set up factories just across the United States-Mexican border—at the expense of American jobs.

This is the topic of my most recent weekly newspaper column. It follows:

WASHINGTON REPORT

(By Don J. Pease)

In northern Ohio, there is much talk these days about industrial development—about the need to attract new factories, new employers, to the area.

You should have seen the industrial park I visited two weeks ago. Literally dozens of U.S. firms have set up factories employing thousands of workers.

The industrial park itself is attractive and well-landscaped. The factory buildings are uniformly new or nearly new.

Inside, 200, 400, 600 workers toil in each factory. Each building interior is bright, clean, well-lit, air conditioned, well-equipped. A company cafeteria serves workers meals at half the normal price. A company infirmary is staffed by a nurse and visited regularly by a doctor.

The employes seem happy and content. They are, according to their supervisors, efficient, productive, highly motivated workers.

From the viewpoint of job-hungry northern Ohioans, there is just one hitch in this rosy picture. The industrial park is not in the United States.

It's in Juarez, Mexico, just across the border from El Paso, Texas.

The workers in those factories are Mexicans.

They work for 68 cents an hour.

And they are drawing U.S. companies by the hundreds to Mexico.

So far, over 650 American companies have set up assembly operations in Juarez, Nogales and other cities along the 1900-mile U.S.-Mexican border. General Motors, General Electric, RCA, Rockwell International, Samsonite Corp., United Technologies Inc.—the list goes on and on.

The managers of those U.S.-owned factories are clearly skittish about the 68-cents-an-hour wages. They quickly make two points.

First, the 68 cents is the hourly rate. Total employment cost is about $1.40 per hour when fringe benefits (mostly required by the Mexican government) are factored in.

Second, it is claimed, the assembly plants in Mexico help to preserve jobs in the U.S. that would otherwise be lost. Typically, the Mexican "maquila" plants are strictly assembly operations. All of the design and engineering work is done at U.S. locations. All of the parts to be assembled are made in the U.S.

In fact, one incentive for the "maquila" plants is that when the finished products are returned to the U.S., the value of the original U.S. parts and material is not subject to U.S. tariffs. U.S. duty is paid only on the "value added" (i.e., labor costs) in Mexico.

American firms claim they can't compete with Japanese, Korean, Taiwanese and other competitors if they must pay high American wages for hand assembly work. The choice, they say, is this. Do you split the work between a U.S. plant and a "twin" plant in Mexico, or do you lose the work altogether?

There is evidence of truth to that contention. In Georgia and South Carolina, for example, apparel manufacturers find it increasingly difficult to compete with imported apparel from the Far East. By moving their sewing operations to Mexico, these companies preserve jobs at home in the design and cutting of fabrics. They also, incidentally, continue to be in business as customers of U.S. textile companies. Obviously, apparel made in China uses textiles made in China.

Still, it was wrenching for me to see all those jobs in Mexico which used to be performed in Ohio and elsewhere in the U.S.

If the choice of workers at an American factory really is between no jobs at all and sharing the jobs, the choice is clear if not entirely pleasant.

But what of U.S. manufacturing firms which do not face foreign competition or which are still competitive in the international marketplace? They may not be forced to move their assembly operations to Mexico, but they can make higher profits if they can cut their compensation costs to $1.40 per hour for hand assembly work. In other words, if a company is making 9 percent profit in the U.S., what is to prevent its moving to Mexico and increasing its profit to 10 percent? After all, the business of business is to make a profit, and a good manager is expected to maximize his or her company's profit.

The Americans I talked with in Juarez, didn't have an answer to the question. Frankly, I don't have an answer either. But the question merits a lot of thought by those of us who are trying desperately to retain and foster economic health in areas like northern Ohio.●

INTRODUCTION OF SPACE WEAPONS TREATY RESOLUTION

HON. GEORGE E. BROWN, JR.

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, the development of space weapons, including strategic defensive systems and antisatellite weapons, threatens the framework for the control of nuclear weapons established in the 1972 antiballistic missile treaty, and thus also threatens the future of arms control. My concern leads me today to introduce legislation which calls on the President to negotiate a treaty providing for strict limitations on space weapons. The legislation also calls on the President to reaffirm the commitment of the United States to the ABM treaty, including restraint on programs which could undermine the treaty, and to seek an agreement with the Soviet Union for a mutual antisatellite [ASAT] moratorium on tests against objects in space.

My colleagues, Congressman JOE MOAKLEY, and Congressman NORM DICKS, have joined me as original sponsors of this legislation. As authors of legislation in the last Congress addressing various aspects of arms control in space, we have combined our efforts in introducing this omnibus bill.

Congressman MOAKLEY spearheaded efforts in support of arms control in space several years ago when he authored legislation calling for the negotiation of a treaty to ban weapons in space. Congressman DICKS was the author of legislation calling on the President to negotiate a treaty on antisatellite weapons. Finally, Mr. Chairman, as you know I introduced legislation last year to reaffirm the commitment of the United States to the 1972 antiballistic missile [ABM] treaty. I am honored to be joined by my distinguished colleagues in introducing this omnibus legislation addressing these major areas of concern regarding arms control in space.

Mr. Speaker, I would now like to outline the major points of the bill:

The first section of the bill calls on the President to seek the negotiation of a treaty between the United States and the Soviet Union providing for the strictest possible mutual and verifiable limitations on the testing, production, deployment, and use of all space-directed or space-based weapons systems. The intent of this section is to indicate the strong support of Congress for the negotiations in Geneva, and to indicate support for a treaty which would include limits on space weapons, including antisatellite weapons and strategic defensive systems.

The second section of the bill calls on the President to seek an agreement with the Soviet Union for a moratorium on antisatellite weapons tests against targets in space. The intent of this section is to underscore the importance of a near-term agreement to limit ASAT tests in order to facilitate the negotiation of a treaty providing for strict and verifiable limitations on antisatellite weapons.

The third section of the bill calls on the President to reaffirm the commitment of the United States to the ABM Treaty, and to refrain from activities which could undermine the treaty. The intent of this section is consistent with stated administration policy.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that the President is sincere in his desire for world peace. However, the preponderance of evidence provided by opponents, and acknowledged by proponents of the SDI, indicate that there is no defensive system that we can currently conceive of which could protect the American people from Soviet nuclear missiles. The President's own advisers now speak of the enhanced deterrence which might be provided by an SDI system, whereas they once spoke of assured survival. To suggest that star wars could put the nuclear genie back into the bottle is to perpetrate a cruel hoax on the American people, and to oversimplify the complex nature of our nuclear age.

I would like to comment briefly on the administration "Report to Congress on the Strategic Defense Initiative" submitted in its unclassified version to the Congress last week. I note with grave concern the administration's stated intention to conduct tests of ABM components, which is outlawed by the ABM Treaty, as ASAT's, in order to circumvent ABM Treaty restrictions. This is in blatant disregard of the spirit of the ABM Treaty, and raises serious questions about the administration's intentions in the Geneva arms control talks. It also underscores the need for a treaty limiting antisatellite weapons if we hope to preserve the ABM Treaty, and prevent an arms race in space.

In light of these concerns, and of the threat posed to critical reconnaissance and early warning systems by ASAT's, Congressman COUGHLIN intends to offer an amendment to the fiscal year 1986 defense authorization bill to reestablish an ASAT test moratorium. The House overwhelmingly supported a similar amendment last year. I will also be investigating the possibility of limiting other ASAT systems, in addition to the F-15 ASAT, in order to protect the viability of the ABM Treaty and address the problems raised by the President's SDI report to Congress.

Mr. Speaker, research on ballistic-missile defense systems and on antisatellite weapons has gone on for the past 20 years. I support continued research on defensive systems, on Earth and in space, at a prudent level. But this effort should be combined with a renewed commitment to observe the 1972 Antiballistic Missile Treaty, and with a willingness to negotiate a further treaty prohibiting weapons of any kind in space. A treaty limiting antisatellite weapons should be included as a protocol to the ABM Treaty or negotiated as a separate treaty. In such an atmosphere, the arms control negotiations in Geneva would have a chance of succeeding in reducing all classes of nuclear weapons on Earth, and of preventing an escalation of the arms race on Earth and in space. Without such a commitment, I am skeptical of the outcome of the arms control negotiations in Geneva.

Thank you Mr. Speaker. The text of the Space Weapons Treaty Resolution appears below:

H.J. RES. 252

Joint resolution calling on the President to negotiate a treaty between the United States and the Soviet Union which provides for strict mutual and verifiable limitations on space weapons, to provide for an agreement with the Soviet Union for a moratorium on the testing of anti-satellite weapons, and to provide for the continued United States commitment to the 1972 Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty

Whereas the United States and the Soviet Union have agreed to engage in arms control negotiations on space weapons and strategic and intermediate-range nuclear weapons;

Whereas the moratorium observed by the United States and the Soviet Union on the testing of anti-satellite weapons against objects in space has helped to create an atmosphere conducive to successful negotiations; and

Whereas the Treaty between the United States and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics on the Limitation of Anti-Ballistic Missile Systems (the ABM Treaty) provides the foundation for negotiations to limit strategic arms: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This joint resolution may be cited as the "Space Weapons Treaty Act".

SEC. 2. NEGOTIATION OF SPACE WEAPONS TREATY.

The President should seek the negotiation of a treaty between the United States and the Soviet Union providing for the strictest possible mutual and verifiable limitations on the testing, production, deployment, and use of all space-directed or space-based weapons systems.

SEC. 3. MUTUAL MORATORIUM ON ANTI-SATELLITE WEAPONS TESTS.

The President shall seek the negotiation of an agreement with the Soviet Union for a moratorium on the testing of anti-satellite weapons against an object in space.

SEC. 4. STATEMENT OF UNITED STATES COMMITMENT TO ABM TREATY.

(a) REAFFIRMATION OF COMMITMENT TO TREATY.—The President shall reaffirm the commitment of the United States to the Treaty between the United States and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics on the Limitation of Anti-Ballistic Missile Systems (entered into force October 3, 1972), and avoid any program or activity which could undermine continued compliance with the Treaty by its signatories.●

FARM BANKRUPTCY BILL

HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing legislation, with Mr. FISH, Mr. DE LA GARZA, Mr. SEIBERLING, and Mr. SYNAR, to help farmers who are forced to file bankruptcy. On March 5, 1985, I introduced H.R. 1397, and Mr. SYNAR introduced H.R. 1399, both farm bankruptcy bills. A hearing was held on H.R. 1397 and H.R. 1399 by the Subcommittee on Monopolies and Commercial Law of the House Judiciary Committee. As a result of testimony given at this hearing, and of continued study of the farm bankruptcy problem, this bill is being introduced today. It combines the best parts of H.R. 1397 and H.R. 1399 and incorporates several new features that emerged during the subcommittee hearings.

Because of the downturn in the farm economy today, more farmers than ever before are being forced to seek the protection of the bankruptcy laws in order to make a meaningful effort to continue farming operations. In the southern district of Iowa, for example, as reported in the March 17, 1985 Des Moines Register, the number of farm bankruptcies increased to 258 in 1984, up from only 7 in 1980.

In just the first 2 months of 1985, 58 new farm bankruptcies were filed in this district, a 45-percent increase over the farm filings during the first 2 months of 1984. Chapter 11 farm bankruptcy filings in the northern district of Iowa during the first 2 months of 1985 were up by 25 percent over the same period last year, after more than doubling from 1983 to 1984. Likewise, in South Dakota, the number of farm and ranch bankruptcies increased tenfold from 1980 to 1984 and are still increasing; farm and ranch bankruptcies now represent nearly one-fourth of the bankruptcy caseload in South Dakota, up from 2.4 percent of the caseload in 1980. This bill offers additional protection to the farmers who must file bankruptcy.

The bill would allow more farmers to file bankruptcy under the quick, simple provisions of chapter 13, where payments to creditors are made from the future earnings of a debtor. Currently, most farm debtors who are forced to file bankruptcy must do so under the chapter 11 reorganization provisions of the Bankruptcy Code, which are more complex and costly than chapter 13. In chapter 11, there is a greater chance than in chapter 13 that a farmer's land, the principal source of farm revenue, could be liquidated by creditors.

The bill creates a new class of farmer for purposes of chapter 13, termed the family farmer. A family farmer is defined as a person who has over 80 percent of their debt arising out of farming operations. By tying the defintion of a family farmer to the amount of debt rather than to the amount of income, farmers who have struggled for several years and who have been forced to take jobs outside of farming in order to make ends meet, will still be able to utilize the provisions of chapter 13 if the bulk of their debt is farm-related. A family farmer could be an individual or a partnership.

Under current law, one cannot be a chapter 13 debtor unless their unsecured debts are less than $100,000 and their secured debts are less than $350,000. The bill raises the debt ceiling for family farmers, so that a family farmer can be a chapter 13 debtor if the total of the farmer's secured and unsecured debts is less than $1 million.

Because their income is sporadic, tied to seasonal harvests, farmers often have difficulty meeting the requirements of chapter 13 that they start making plan payments within 30 days after filing the plan. The bill offers a family farmer who has this difficulty the option of a hearing before the bankruptcy court at which the bankruptcy court will consider the facts and circumstances of the farmer's situation, as well as the creditors' situation, and set a deadline by which the family farmer's first plan payment must be made.

Many family farmers live on the same parcel of land they farm. For most family farmers, by far the largest part of their debt is secured debt. Under current law, however, a family farmer who farms on the same parcel of land on which he resides cannot modify the secured debt on this farmland. The bill would permit a family farmer whose principal residence is located on the same parcel of land as his farmland to modify the secured debt on this parcel. This will afford the family farmer a better opportunity to retain the land, while still protecting the lien of a creditor on the land.

To correspond with the increase in the chapter 13 debt ceiling for family farmers, the bankruptcy court is given the power to allow a chapter 13 family farmer up to 7 years, instead of the current 5 years, to make his payments under the plan. All plan payments, except for long-term secured debt and long-term modified secured debt, must be made within this 7-year period.

The legislation also makes a change for a farmer, as opposed to the chapter 13 family farmer, who files under chapter 11 reorganization. The time period in which only the debtor can file a plan is extended, just for farmers, from 120 to 240 days. After 240 days, if no plan has been filed by the farm debtor, creditors can file their own plan proposing repayment by the debtor. By affording the chapter 11 farmer more exclusive time in which to file a plan, the bill allows the farmer more time to guage his economic situation and to anticipate future income from harvests, without having to immediately contend with a plan filed by creditors.

Testimony at the March 27, 1985, hearing before the Subcommittee on Monopolies and Commercial Law indicated that added protection in the bankruptcy laws for the family farmer was best offered through chapter 13 rather than through chapter 11. Any farmer wishing to utilize the more detailed and complex provisions of chapter 11 can still do so, of course. For the many farmers who would like to file under chapter 13, but who have debts in excess of the current chapter 13 limit, the bill offers relief. The ability of farmers to earn a living from their land must be protected if the economy of this country is to be strong. The treatment the bill offers to farmers, and particularly to family farmers, is justified by the unique position farmers occupy in the U.S. economy.●

LIBRARIES DESERVE CONTINUED SUPPORT

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, there are many kinds of credit cards available today—but one of the best kind of cards to have—is a library card.

With a library card we are able to receive—free of charge—a host of community services that not only provide education and entertainment, but serve a focal point within communities for a variety of activities.

Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, the administration has failed to recognize the role of libraries in this country. For the fourth year in a row—the President has proposed to eliminate funding for the Library Services and Construction Act. In addition, there is a proposed elimination of funding for title II of the Higher Education Act, which provides support for college libraries.

I will state today, as I have in previous years, that elimination of support, both direct and indirect, for libraries compromises our ability to provide ongoing educational and learning opportunities for those who would have no other source of information.

Attempts to eliminate the current postal subsidies for libraries will also cause great hardship. For example, the impact on the New York Public Library—our Nation's largest and greater resource in this area—the Senate budget proposal would mean the loss of $860,000 in services to the blind and handicapped, $252,000 in third class mail services that allows the library to inform it friends on new programs and projects, as well as sharply curtail its ability to raise non-Federal funds; and $10,500 for newsletters.

For the benefit of my colleagues, I would also like to place in the RECORD a copy of the letter I recently received from the president of the New York Public Library, Vartan Gregorian, which I believe amply illustrates my point in these areas.

Libraries are one of our greatest national resources and to erode their already-limited means of support would seriously hamper our intellectual strength as a nation.

THE NEW YORK PUBLIC LIBRARY,
New York, NY, April 12, 1985.

DEAR MEMBER OF CONGRESS: At a time when the importance of an educated and informed citizenry has never been greater, there is grave danger that all federal support for libraries, a major source of learning and information for the nation's citizens, will be eliminated. I write to you, and The New York Public Library's librarians visit, to let you know of the harm that would result from these proposals.

The New York Public Library is a large and complex institution. It includes both circulating and research functions, and receives substantial public and private funding. Because of this complexity, the ways in which federal actions affect the Library are numerous. Administration proposals on a variety of subjects, if enacted, would have a devastating impact on our ability to serve the public. I would like to bring to your attention some of the major programs proposed for elimination or major reductions:

Library Services and Construction Act (LSCA).—This program, located within the Department of Education, is scheduled for elimination this year. If this elimination is enacted, the New York Public Library would be forced, in turn, to eliminate or drastically reduce the many programs funded by LSCA. These include: training volunteer readers at our Library for the Blind, conducting literacy tutoring and English as a Second Language Instruction, publishing the Directory of Community Services, and providing a job advisory service. With LSCA funds we are also able, this year, to make one of our branches accessible to the handicapped, and to run a computerized data base for circulating libraries in the region. The projected annual loss to The New York Public Library in LSCA funds would be $989,000; the loss to those who use our programs and services would be much more.

Strengthening Research Library Resources (Title II C).—A valuable resource for the nation's future will be lost if this Department of Education program is eliminated, as has been proposed. The rich collections of research libraries are well known; what is not so well known is the extent to which these collections are often deteriorating on the shelves or otherwise inaccessible. With a $235,000 grant from Title II C, The New York Public Library is microfilming valuable material on World War I. Without this project, a valuable record would have decayed to the point of not being usable; now a filmed record exists.

The National Endowment for the Humanities is another agency of major concern to The New York Public Library. This agency is proposed for a reduction of 11%. One program within the agency is singled out for a cut of 57%—The Public Libraries Program. While we oppose any reduction in the NEH funding, we particularly deplore the size of the reduction in the Public Libraries Program. The NEH has provided close to $2 million a year in general operating support for The Research Libraries of NYPL. In addition, projects that have been or will be conducted with NEH support include: cataloging American Musical manuscripts, the exhibit and program "Censorship: 500 Years of Conflict," access to our manuscripts and archives collection, and the upcoming exhibit "New World Voyages in the Age of Discovery."

Revenue Foregone Postal Subsidy.—The administration has proposed total elimination of the appropriation that supports 3rd class mailing for non-profit organizations and for the blind. In place of the appropriations, cross-subsidization is proposed whereby first class rates would subsidize non-profits and the blind. This is illegal under current postal law. Any change in the law would be controversial and would require lengthy review. The postal subsidy through appropriation of $981 million must continue until such time as a new method becomes law. The enclosed fact sheet demonstrates that the cost to this institution would be over $1 million if postal subsidies were eliminated.

Revisions in Tax Law.—The New York Public Library has historically been supported by a partnership between the public and private sectors. Annual giving by private donors is essential to our operations, as are major gifts for endowment and capital needs. The incentive in the tax code for private giving is critical to maintaining and building this funding base. We urge that changes in the tax code not discourage the generous individuals whose help is critical to our future.

Telecommunications Costs.—A new filing by AT&T before the Federal Communications Commission would send telecommunications costs for libraries skyrocketing. Computerized networks are increasingly a major means by which libraries provide information to users. Because libraries are committed to providing access to information and learning free of charge, we have no way of passing these costs on to users. Because of this role of libraries is so thoroughly in the public interest, a special exemption or a "library rate" should be instated, and the AT&T request before the FCC should be denied.

I want to mention briefly two other agencies endangered by budget cuts, The National Endowment for The Arts and the National Historical Publications and Records Commission. The programs of these agencies provide essential support to libraries and other cultural institutions; we urge their continuation at current levels.

The sheer length of this list demonstrates the extent to which the administration's proposals will hurt libraries and the public they serve. For The New York Public Library, we estimate a loss of $2 million from the elimination of LSCA and postal subsidies alone, with the potential of much greater harm from changes in telecommunications and tax policies.

I urge you to help reverse these damaging proposals. We and the citizens we serve need your assistance. Thank you for your consideration and attention.

Sincerely,

VARTAN GREGORIAN.●

RESOLUTIONS OF NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF PRO AMERICA

HON. DUNCAN HUNTER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Speaker, I have the honor today of inserting for the RECORD a number of resolutions which have been adopted by the National Association of Pro America, a highly respected group. These resolutions address a number of timely subjects which we are currently facing. I would like to commend this fine group for their dedication to preserving a strong, free America.

The resolutions are as follows:

OPPOSITION TO COMPARABLE PAY

Whereas The Equal Pay for Comparable Worth issue has the potential for becoming the most confrontational, social, economic, and political issue of the coming years; and

Whereas under a mandated system of comparable worth, jobs would be given a numerical rating according to a subjective scale, jobs with the same ratings would be required to be paid equally, thus jobs held mostly by women (i.e., nurses) could be required to have the same hourly pay as those held mostly by men (i.e., plumbers) if those jobs were given the same ratings; and

Whereas the principle of equality of opportunity in the workplace has been established by the Health and Manpower Training Act of 1971, the Equal Opportunity Act of 1972, and the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act of 1972, and therefore a woman must be hired for any job she can qualify for including those traditionally held by men; and

Whereas in a free society, and under the free enterprise system, it is the function of the marketplace to determine worth: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the National Association of Pro America strongly supports equal pay for equal work and equal employment opportunity, but strongly opposes any attempt by the government to determine the comparable worth of different occupations.

VICTORY OVER COMMUNISTS IN CENTRAL AMERICA

Whereas Soviet communists have already captured Cuba and Nicaragua mainly through political and economic assistance from the U.S. Government; and

Whereas the United States has turned over the Panama Canal to the marxist government of Panama as the result of a treaty, ratification of which is in dispute; and

Whereas the communists are attempting to destabilize, terrorize and through guerrilla warfare to seize control of El Salvador; and

Whereas Guatemala, Honduras, and Costa Rica are subject to Communist destabilization measures with the ultimate target being the United States of America; and

Whereas U.S. aid to El Salvador has been conditioned upon continuance of former President Duarte's ill advised, U.S. supported, marxist policies of agrarian reform and nationalization of many businesses with never the goal of victory over communism.

Whereas Central America is the first line of defense for the United States and is where this subversion and planned conquest of our hemisphere and of our country should be stopped with the least expenditure of time, money, and lives; and

Whereas the Monroe Doctrine, as enunciated by President James Monroe in 1823, stated, "The American continents, by the free and independent condition which they have assumed and maintain, are henceforth not to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any European power", and any attempt by European powers "to extend their political system to any portion of this hemisphere would be considered as dangerous to our peace and safety"; now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the National Association of Pro America call upon the United States Government to reassert the Monroe Doctrine and adopt a policy of victory over communists and support for anti-Communists in Central America to rid this hemisphere of the deadly threat of survival of freedom in Central America and the United States.

TAX INDEXING

Whereas our liberal spenders, on both sides of the aisle, in Congress are threatening to repeal the tax indexing program due to begin in 1985; and

Whereas the tax indexing program, which adjusts tax brackets to compensate for inflation and prevents "bracket creep", is phase 3 of President Reagan's tax cut; and

Whereas assuming an inflation rate of 5 percent, eliminating indexing would cause the 1985 tax liability of those with incomes under $10,000 to rise more than 9 percent, while the liability of those with incomes over $100,000 would rise by less than 2 percent; and

Whereas this same elimination would, in effect, amount to Congress' imposing another $100 billion tax upon the population, hurting most those least able to withstand the increase; and

Whereas our representatives in Washington, DC have actually been forced to stand up and be counted as they voted to raise the income tax levy exactly one time in 24 years, (during President Johnson's administration when they voted a surtax to finance his "Great Society"); and

Whereas because inflation has pushed us into higher tax brackets, we have had "taxation without representation" for those 24 years; now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the National Association of Pro America urge Congress to preserve the tax indexing (phase 3), and that in the future all legislators be required to record their tax votes for the information of their constituents.

PARENTAL RIGHTS AND THE PRIVATE CHRISTIAN SCHOOLS

Whereas some private Christain Schools are refusing the hire State certified teachers and are refusing State licensure on the grounds that the instruction of children is part of the Biblically based parental responsibility to raise their children up in the precepts and admonishment of the Lord, which those parents have delegated to the church school and that requiring certification of the teachers and licensure on other grounds than student achievement is a violation of parental rights; and

Whereas students at private Christian schools which reject the teaching of humanist values generally demonstrate educational achievement one or more levels above their counterparts in the public schools, thus indicating that control of students, not education is the goal; and

Whereas Alexis de Tocqueville noted, "America is still the place where the Christian religion has kept the greatest real power over men's souls, and nothing better demonstrates how useful and natural it is to man, since the country where it now has the widest sway is both enlightened and the freest"; now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the National Association of Pro America call upon governments and courts at all levels to discontinue attacks on and efforts at control over the private Christian school, and reaffirm Pro America Resolution VIII, 1979, "IRS Attack on Private (Nongovernment) Schools" and Resolution V, 1977, "Exempt Christians Schools and Child Care Centers From Government Regulation".

DEMAND ACCOUNTABILITY IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Whereas additions to customs, procedures and even the rules regarding "unanimous consent" (the method for members to request particular legislation be brought to the floor of the House) has been changed by the House of Representatives majority leadership; and

Whereas many minority members of the House have asked "unanimous consent" that the House deal with several basic issues such as a balance budget, voluntary prayer in the schools, line item veto, and that the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD be made a factual documentation of the proceedings of Congress; and

Whereas in each and every instance the majority leadership has turned down these requests by minority party members; and

Whereas the committee chairmanships in the House are held by a Member of the majority party and with proxy (ghost) voting, Members of the majority party need not be present in committee hearings to have their vote counted; and

Whereas minority members have endeavored to use "Calendar Wednesday" (requests by members to committee chairman to bring legislation to the floor) to bring legislation to the floor of the House but are unsuccessful because the committee chairman reports there is no legislation to present; and

Whereas the majority leadership is denying the minority Congressmen the right to present legislation in the best interest of their constituents, as is our right in a Republic: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the National Association of Pro America protests the maneuvering of customs, procedures and rules by the majority leadership, which is denying the American people proper representation by elimination debate on important legislation and is making the minority Congressmen figureheads.●

CONGRESSMAN PASSED LOVE OF LITERATURE ON TO HIS DAUGHTER

HON. DALE E. KILDEE

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. KILDEE. Mr. Speaker, one of our most distinguished and admired Members, the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. NATCHER, is noted for keeping a history of Congress. His interest in and love of history and literature seems to have been passed on to his daughter, Mrs. Louise Murphy. I would like to bring to your attention a book review in the New York Times of Louise Murphy's novel "The Sea Within." I extend to Mr. NATCHER and through him, to his lovely daughter, Louise, my sincere congratulations on this great accomplishment.

[From the New York Times, Apr. 21, 1985]

CAMILLE'S WILDERNESS

(By Anne Bernays)

"The Sea Within" (a misleading and rather limp title for a book that has nothing flaccid about it) is a lovely, brave piece of work by a first novelist of shining promise. Camille Anderson, 39 years old, leaves Henry, her husband of many years, when she discovers he has been sleeping with a former friend of hers. The marriage was never much good anyway. She now has no use for the hypocritical Henry, who, despite a small, mean soul, "could keep the banner of niceguyism flying defiantly if not proudly."

Leaving San Francisco and returning to Kentucky, her childhood home, Camille confronts the wilderness, not the "calm gently rolling . . . farmland. My wilderness was the brush and thickets of my failures." She sets up a tent on the only land she owns, a cemetery plot 130 by 40 feet. From there she ventures outward, to visit her beloved great-aunt Nell and explore her past. Along the way she begins a tentative love affair with an old beau, Tom Church, and involves herself with the fate of her distant cousin, 15-year-old Dinah, who is pregnant and miserable. How Dinah got that way—as well as how Tom was involved—forms the resolution of this artfully plotted story.

From time to time, Louise Murphy breaks into her narrative to take a short side trip, stopping at, among other places, the Indian wars, Abraham Lincoln, the Shakers, the Bible. In less gifted hands, these detours might make the vehicle break down, but in Mrs. Murphy's they add interest and richness to the journey.

Camille is hungry for history; twice a week she goes to the library to stuff herself on Kentucky lore. Mrs. Murphy must have done the same thing; she is sure-footed, authentic and often harrowing in retelling what she has learned, as in the story of Jenny Wiley and her Cherokee captors.

Having seen her children scalped and slaughtered, given birth in a cave, been tied to a tree and threatened with death by fire, Jenny escapes and creates a new life for herself. "When Jenny Wiley lay dying at seventy-one, in the year 1831 . . . did [she] think of her lost children? Did she long to join them in another land, or were her living children enough? Had she found life sweet enough to recompense for that one year as a captive? How sweet is life? How sweet?" Mrs. Murphy is too good a writer either to try to answer this question or to draw an explicit parallel between Jenny and Camille.

This novel is about such familiar items as late-blooming identity, women's struggle to survive in brutal interior and exterior landscapes, sex and making choices. What sets it apart is the author's freshness of tone and language and a panoramic vision she has translated into beautifully controlled prose. Thus of a basket with a baby in it (which may or may not sink in the river on which it rides), she writes: "It was there, bobbing and turning gently in the river. The basket floated slowly with the summer current and the handle stood up in a ludicrous curve that turned and became a single line as the basket circled."

And this is Camille's wry comment about divorce: "It is obvious that the two people failed. The best defense is to assure everyone how radically you have changed since the separation. Such change proves that the marriage was repressive and did not allow you to develop the way you could outside the limiting strictures of the marriage."

Camille begins with bitterness and a terrible sense of failure. Having drawn close to her aunt Nell and the awfulness of Dinah's life, she absorbs several homely truths that, if they are not earthshaking, satisfy a need—both Camille's and the reader's—for resolution and forward motion.●

TRIBUTE TO DR. KELSY J. CAPLINGER III

HON. TOMMY ROBINSON

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, it is my honor today to recognize and congratulate one of my distinguished constituents, Dr. Kelsy J. Caplinger III, of Little Rock, AR. Dr. Caplinger was just presented the President's Volunteer Action Award by President Ronald Reagan. This is a proud day for me, because Dr. Caplinger is a fine example of all Arkansans. He has given much of his life to those sometimes less fortunate than himself.

In 1971, Dr. Caplinger founded Med Camps of Arkansas. At that time, 12 children with allergies and asthma participated for 1 week in the summer. Each year, more weeks and more types of disabilities were added until in 1983 a peak of 10 weeks with over 300 children sponsored by 8 health-related agencies came for the most exciting week of their lives.

Dr. Caplinger has contributed his time and energy to initiate and then guarantee the success of this project. Today he is a proud man because of all the happiness that has come from Med Camps of Arkansas. I congratulate Dr. Caplinger for his achievements and wish him well as he continues to make life so much better for the ill and handicapped children of Arkansas.●

JOB PROSPECTS IN THE NUCLEAR POWER INDUSTRY IMPROVE WHILE CANDIDATES FOR NUCLEAR ENGINEERING CAREERS DECLINE

HON. MARILYN LLOYD

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mrs. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, a study completed last year by the Department of Energy has suggested that employment trends in the U.S. nuclear power industry for scientists, engineers, and other technical people should "continue to grow through the 1980's and 1990's." This information should be received well by universities whose enrollment in nuclear engineering has declined or stayed at a status quo for a number of years. Also, those engineering students who have had some trepidation about entering nuclear engineering as a career should take heart from the findings of this report. According to "Nucleonics Week," which reported on this study in its November 29, 1984, issue, researchers at the Oak Ridge Associated Universities suggested that even assuming a low industry growth scenario, job openings between 1990 and the year 2000 will still average 10,000 jobs per year.

In testimony presented before the Subcommittee on Energy Research and Production on February 21, 1985, Prof. Glenn F. Knoll, who is chairman of an organization of university nuclear engineering department heads, noted that in the three decades that followed the initial surge of interest in nuclear energy, enrollment in nuclear engineering programs at the 50 universities represented by his organization has declined 10 to 30 percent. According to Professor Knoll, this decline has coincided with the period in which the nuclear power industry has undergone significant problems. He argued eloquently that this is a serious challenge which must be addressed, not only by the educational community, but also by those in Government who may be in a position to help reverse the trend. Referring to the aforementioned study, Professor Knoll pointed out that "if, as many of us believe, new reactor starts will be required in the 1990's, then a sizable shortfall in the supply of nuclear engineers in this industry is predicated." Professor Knoll suggested several ways in which the Congress and the Department could assist nuclear engineering programs at the various universities in maintaining their strength and reversing their enrollment trends of the last few years. These steps, according to Professor Knoll, involve "the issues of research support, graduate student fellowships, and support for university research reactors."

The chief investigator for the DOE-sponsored study noted that the "real decline in—university—nuclear engineering programs is probably inappropriate." Last year, the full Committee on Science and Technology reported out a bill (H.R. 5244) that provided for enhanced support for university programs in nuclear engineering. In the report accompanying this bill, it was noted that this decline in student enrollment has produced a potential problem that must be remedied in order to assure the preservation of the nuclear power option for future generations. Indeed, the DOE study made the following observation: In order to "avoid bottlenecks and potentially costly shortages for the civilian nuclear industry, the employment situation will have to be carefully monitored in the future. Where the potential for shortages is high, it may be appropriate to consider actions aimed at increasing the likelihood of qualified engineers, scientists, and technicians choosing careers in the civilian nuclear industry."

We are again advocating such support in fiscal year 1986. In the report accompanying the authorizing bills, House Resolution 1799, the Committee on Science and Technology has made specific recommendations for inclusion of university participation in the mainstream Nuclear Fission R&D programs. These areas include the proposed development of advanced reactor concepts, such as advanced light water reactors and advanced liquid metal reactor designs, and the new and exciting programs in the development of compact nuclear power systems for space applications. In my judgment, these long-range research efforts are well suited to providing a fertile area for the creative thinking one expects from university research efforts.

It is my firm belief that through the cooperative efforts of organizations such as the Nuclear Engineering Department Heads Organization, the Department of Energy, and the new Strategic Defense Initiative Office in the Department of Defense, working in conjunction with the Congress, federally sponsored activities can be promoted in support of the nuclear engineering departments at our major universities throughout the country. I wholeheartedly support these activities and recommend that my colleagues in the 99th Congress also support these efforts in order to assure the preservation of the nuclear power option for future generations.●

CORPORATE CITIZENSHIP IN FALL RIVER, MA

HON. BARNEY FRANK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, I recently received some very good news about an example of good corporate citizenship that should be shared with the membership. I've been informed by John B. Cummings, the executive vice president of the United Way of Greater Fall River, Inc., of a very large donation made to needy people in Fall River by the Anderson Little Co.

Working through the United Way, Anderson Little donated $263,000 in new boys clothing—more than 10,000 suits, sport coats, slacks, shirts, ties, and outerwear. It was distributed by the United Way to 12 member agencies, 8 non-United Way agencies, and 17 churches. And they in turn distributed this clothing to children on the days before Easter.

Mr. Cummings informs me that this is the largest gift ever received by the United Way of Greater Fall River and one of the single largest single merchandise gifts ever presented to a United Way anywhere in the country.

I join Mr. Cummings in expressing our gratitude to Chief Executive Officer William Gaudreau and Executive Vice President Lee Sunderland of Anderson Little.●

AN OUTSTANDING SEASON IN PRINCE GEORGES COUNTY

HON. STENY H. HOYER

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. HOYER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to bring to the attention of you and my fellow colleagues, the success of three high school basketball teams located in my district. I am proud to announce the accomplishments of these three teams from Suitland, Forestville, and La-Reine High Schools.

Under the dedicated leadership of their head coach, Mr. Irwin Hay, the Suitland Rams won the county championship and the regional championship, on their way to a victory at the Maryland State Class AA basketball championship. Their season ended with a 21 and 4 record. Some of the members received other honors as well. Seniors, Louis Harris and Rick Peters, were chosen for the all-county first team. Roddy Peters was chosen for the second team and Mike Hardy, William Scales, and Marvin Gantt all received honorable mention. Other team members include David Beatty, Aaron Davis, Torin Savoy, Kevin Roberts, and Byran Lewis. Coach Hay with his assistants, Mr. Robert Johnson and Mr. Charles Mackey should be commemorated along with the 11-member team. As an alumnus of Suitland High School, I share a special pride with the team and the school in this year's achievements.

Another Prince Georges County team, the Forestville Knights, completed their season with a 19 and 3 record and the Boy's Maryland State Class B Basketball Championship under their belt. Head Coach Aaron Holder, The Prince Georges County Journal, "Coach of the Year," and assistant coaches Paul Lewis and Michael Fisher led the young team to a very successful season. Team members chosen for the all-county first team were Terry Brent and Oram Fields. Gary Botts received second team honors, with honorable mention going to Ronald Banks and Guy Owens. Jasper Abraham, Tommy Bennett, Robbie Burton, Dale Champion, Ralph Dykes, Elton Gaston, James Hallameyer, Darius Holmes, Darin Martin, and Tyrone Powell complete the Knights basketball team. The team also received support from managers Raynard Davis and Troy Thompson and statistician, Carla Jackson.

Finally, one of Prince Georges County's outstanding young women's basketball teams, the LeReine Royals, accomplished second place at the Largo Tournament, first place at the Pallotti Tournament, and won the Catholic Girls Athletic Association Championship. Captain Charmayne Sugars and Cheron Pearson, along with their teammates, Eva Thorne, Collette Rohan, Kerry Mangold, Eileen Briley, Ja Neen Roscoe, Ja Nae Roscoe, Angela Alston, and Monica Bradley compiled a 12 and 6 record. Head Coach Edward McNamara and his assistants, Charles Rohan and Virginia McNamara have every right to be proud of the team. Managers Patrice Johnson, Cathy Antroinen, and Becky Peterson also contributed to the winning season.

All of Prince Georges County is proud of the accomplishments of these three teams. I also know that their successes would not have been possible without the support of fellow students, faculty, school administrators, and the families of the players. Every person who played a part in the winning season gained victory for their schools bringing a renewed sense of pride to our community and lifting school morale for many seasons to come.●

AID TO THE CONTRAS

HON. DAN MICA

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. MICA. Mr. Speaker, the struggle in Nicaragua today is of concern to all thoughtful Americans who care about freedom and our Nation's security. The Sandinista government of Nicaragua has presented our Nation with one of its most vexing foreign policy dilemmas in the hemisphere since Fidel Castro rose to power in Cuba some 25 years ago. Before we make our final decision on this critical vote, I believe it is imperative that we chronologically review developments in Nicaragua.

On July 17, 1979, a broad-based coalition forced the resignation of Nicaraguan President Anastasio Somoza. Somoza's opponents had agreed to share power, but with the FSLN [Sandinista] military triumph, these promises soon disintegrated. Still, strong international support, including our own, was forthcoming to the new Nicaraguan Government for most of the first year after Somaza's overthrow.

Throughout their rise to dominance, the Sandinistas promised to establish a governmental system based on political pluralism, full respect for human rights, a nonaligned foreign policy and a mixed economy. But by the second anniversary of the revolution, private sector organizations and the Catholic Church claimed that the Nicaraguan Government was moving toward a totalitarian state. These organizations and political parties pushed for guarantees for free elections, freedom of speech, trade unions, a mixed economy, and a role in the government. In response, the Sandinistas announced repressive laws prohibiting these basic freedoms.

It is clear that since the 1979 revolution the Sandinistas have failed to move toward their proclaimed goals. In the area of religious freedom and human rights, the Sandinistas have persecuted many of their people for their beliefs. I was deeply offended by the Sandinista's treatment of the Pope during his recent visit. Their indiscriminate abuse—some say genocide—of the Miskitos Indians, is reprehensible and disgraceful conduct for any civilized nation.

In the arena of foreign policy, I find it horrendous that the Sandinistas have embraced the Palestinian Liberation Organization [PLO] and Colonel Qadhafi of Libya—both well known for perpetrating terrorism. They have rejected the diplomacy of the Contadora group and welcomed Cuban military advisors into their revolution. They have signed a series of economic and cultural agreements with the Soviet Union as well as a mutual support agreement with the Communist Party of the Soviet Union. The Sandinista's have pledged to build the largest standing army in Central America, and with the help of Cubans and Soviets, they have achieved this goal—61,000 active duty and 40,000 reserves.

I do not advocate direct U.S. military intervention in Nicaragua. I support diplomatic efforts such as those espoused by the Contadora group. I believe the administration should more forcefully pursue diplomatic efforts and develop a cohesive and comprehensive policy toward the turmoil in Central America. However, I feel to have another Cuba in our hemisphere, exporting Communist revolution, will have a detrimental impact on our Nation in the future. There is no doubt in my mind that the Sandinista's policies are a threat to its democratic neighbors and to U.S. security interests in Central America. Therefore, for the many reasons I have stated, I will vote in favor of providing $14 million in assistance to the Nicaraguan Contra forces.●

CHILD ABUSE PREVENTION MONTH

HON. DENNIS M. HERTEL

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. HERTEL of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, children, all too often, are the silent victims of parental abuse. Theirs is a nightmarish existence, a bittersweet admixture of love and hate, pain and comfort. When one considers the physical and emotional trauma suffered by abused and neglected children, it becomes clear that action must be taken immediately to stop the cycle of violence which plagues our children—and society. As a sponsor of legislation which declared April as "Child Abuse Prevention Month," I would like to take this opportunity to explore how child abuse can be treated and prevented. For a clearer perspective on how this goal can be achieved, it is crucial to understand what constitutes abuse and neglect, the physical and behavioral signs of abuse, its incidence, who abuses, and the factors which currently impede progress in the fight to end child abuse.

While no clear definition of child abuse exists, the following descriptions provide a general framework of maltreatment. Physical abuse, or the sadistic injuries which more frequently make the headlines—such as burns, welts, whipmarks, broken bones, black eyes, and internal injuries—is one form of abuse. Another type of mistreatment is physical neglect, which includes the lack of proper clothing, food, medical care, or supervision. It can be emotional abuse, as well, such as constant abasements, cursing, threats, or other verbal harassment. Or, child abuse can take the form of emotional neglect, which is the deprivation of basic needs for love and security, praise and recognition, new experiences, and responsibility. Sexual abuse is yet another type of child abuse.

Identification of child abuse entails recognizing the physical signs of mistreatment. According to the National Center on Child Abuse and Neglect, these indicators include: bruises, broken bones, cuts, puncture marks, swollen areas, missing hair, bite marks, or cigarette burns; a high frequency of minor or severe injuries; several injuries in various stages of healing; and clothing which is inappropriate for the weather, yet serves to mask the injuries.

Emotional signs of abuse are harder to detect. However, the following behaviors should serve as red flags: being unduly hostile to authority, excessively disruptive or overly aggressive, or conversely, being passive and withdrawn and frequently crying for no apparent reason; being fearful or uncomfortable in the presence of adults; being consistently tired or hungry.

How prevalent is child abuse? The Children's Defense Fund claims that roughly:

> 1.5 million children were reported abused and neglected in 1983 . . . an increase of 200,000 children, or 15 percent from the year before.

Others have put the figure at 2.2 million cases of physical abuse alone, to say nothing of the other types of maltreatment previously mentioned. The average age of abused children is 7 years, with 24 percent of them between the ages of 12 and 17. The American Humane Association has found that boys are abused as frequently as girls and that 60 percent of child abuse fatalities strike those younger than age 2. These statistics are even more alarming when one takes into account that the child population is decreasing and that there are probably hundreds of thousands of cases which go by unreported.

There are many reasons why the statistical data on child abuse do not accurately reflect its incidence. For one, the welfare and rights of children have historically taken a backseat to those of parents. In 1875, there were laws to protect animals but none to protect children from abuse and neglect. Instead, the concept of pater potestas—all power vested in the father—was firmly entrenched in the American belief system. Not until 1877 were protective agencies for children established. It took nearly another century for legislation to be passed to ensure the well-being of our youth. In part, the absence of child protection laws reflects a second factor leading to nonreporting: The widely held belief that parents should have the right to raise and discipline their children as they choose, without interference. On the governmental level, this has led to a hesitancy to draft child abuse legislation. On a personal level, it has led to a reluctance on the part of neighbors and physicians to comment on another family's childrearing practices. A third cause for inaccurate data is the lack of a precise definition of child abuse and neglect. While State legislatures have attempted to define this problem, circumscribing particular types of maltreatment is a difficult task.

Despite the unprecise figures and the reluctance of many to intervene, the physical and emotional scars inflicted on abused children should be enough to prompt mental health workers and legislators, alike, to go against the tide of public consensus and ignorance and intervene. The effects of abuse range from delays in motor and social development in infants to impaired capacity for pleasure, school learning problems and lower IQ, compulsivity, depression, acute fearfulness, and apathy in school-aged youngsters, to assaultive, self-mutilizing, suicidal, and promiscuous behavior in adolescents. The most common attribute is low self-esteem, which is the result of chronic physical and emotional scarring, humiliation, and scapegoating. Abused children ultimately view themselves with the same contempt shown them. Regardless of their actual innocence, these children are apt to assume that they deserve the punishment they receive.

What type of parent abuses his or her offspring? While child abuse runs across all social, ethnic, and socioeconomic boundaries, those who abuse their children often were abused by their parents when they were children, have low self-esteem, feel worthless and inadequate, have low frustration tolerance, lack knowledge of the stages of child development and therefore hold unrealistic expectations of their children, have unmet dependency needs, which they expect their children to fulfill, feel isolated, are alcohol or drug dependent and/or are victims of spouse abuse.

Those who neglect their children are often unable to tolerate stress or frustration, are unable to express anger directly, and are eager to be rid of the demands of their children. It is important to keep in mind that no single variable is sufficient to produce abusive tendencies. Rather, such behavior is the result of the interaction of these factors.

Therapy which addresses the aforementioned problems and deficiencies of abusive parents is most likely to reduce the rate of child abuse. Group therapy has been found by many researchers to be more effective than individual therapy. Whichever form of treatment is chosen, it should include instruction on child management and development, self-control techniques, and stress management. Most of the limitations of psychological intervention stem from a variety of problems which have nothing to do with the particular method employed.

As noted earlier, there is no set definition of child abuse. Moreover, even when child abuse is suspected, social mores concerning the family and parental rights prevent action by outsiders. Within the family, parents may condone severe punishments, rather than perceiving their behavior as abusive or immoral. Clearly, this reflects not only generational patterns, but cultural acceptance of violence, as well.

Legal impediments, too, restrict the efficacy of treatment. The rights and welfare of children are subordinated in the legal process of establishing parental guilt. Still another factor which precludes proper treatment is the lack of funding for preventive services, protective agencies, and research.

With all of the setbacks to child abuse research and treatment, what can be done to protect our children? One of the most crucial factors is increased public awareness as to the severity of the problem and the need for reform. Not only must the current problem be addressed, but preventive measures must be taken to anticipate and forestall future incidents of abuse. Such measures include those recommended by Anne Harris Cohn, executive director of the National Committee for Prevention of Child Abuse: Increasing parents' and teenagers' knowledge of child development and the demands of parenting; reducing the burden of child care on the primary family unit; reducing the isolation felt by many families; and increasing access to social and health services. In addition, screening of high-risk women during their third trimester, a few days after childbirth, and 1½ months afterward plus home visiting may lead to the early detection and prevention of abuse.

When these suggestions are implemented, when societal views turn against the use of violence, when the court system begins to honor the rights of children, when more money is made available for research, treatment, and educational campaigns, then perhaps our children will be spared the anguish of parental abuse. While these changes cannot come about overnight, let us step up our efforts during Child Abuse Prevention Month and beyond to stop the cycle of abuse. By doing so, we offer a glimmer of hope for a brighter tomorrow for our children.●

DEFICIT OUT OF CONTROL

HON. E. THOMAS COLEMAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. COLEMAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the President has estimated the Federal Government will run a deficit of $222.2 billion this fiscal year—the highest in our history. Furthermore, even if all the recommended budget cuts are enacted in fiscal year 1986, the deficit will still be $180 billion. The accumulated Federal debt held by the public is estimated to rise to approximately $1.7 trillion next year. To the average American, that represents an almost $15,000 debt on every hard-working, tax-paying American today. Some 15 cents out of every Federal tax dollar next year will go just to pay off the $142 billion in interest on the national debt. At the current rate of spending, the Federal budget, by 1987, will consist of more than $1 trillion in outlays. Frankly, my constituents in Missouri are convinced that Federal spending is out of control.

I agree, and that's why I am again reintroducing a resolution calling for what the large majority of Americans are now demanding, a balanced Federal budget. Passage of this measure will effectively put an end to Federal overspending, and will ensure that fiscal responsibility, rather than economic and political expediency, will be the guiding principle of U.S. economic policy.

The resolution I have introduced calls for a constitutional amendment to require a balanced Federal budget. It provides that appropriations made by the United States shall not exceed its revenues, except in times of war or national emergency, when this provision may be suspended by a three-fourths majority vote of both the House and the Senate. It also provides that there shall be no increases in the national debt and that our debt shall be repaid over a 100-year period. As you can see, in addition to forcing a balanced Federal budget, this resolution also offers the cure for the economic hangover caused by the spending binge of recent years—the Federal debt.

On the economic survey and opinion polls I have taken annually since coming to Congress, the people of the sixth District of Missouri have expressed an overwhelmingly serious concern with the lack of control exhibited by Congress over Federal spending. They know that high interest rates, and the record high value of the American dollar—which directly threaten domestic production in a number of vital industries, including steel, textiles, and agriculture—are the direct result of Federal spending practices which have ignored economic reality for far too long.

Missourians also know that Congress will control its spending only when forced to, and if Congress doesn't act soon, they are very likely to take matters into their own hands. Indeed, at the present time 32 States have petitioned for a constitutional convention to consider a balanced budget amendment. It is my belief that Congress as an institution is much better prepared to provide the careful study and consideration this issue requires, and that it should not relinquish its constitutional role in this area.

Failure to bring Federal spending under control can result only in the collapse of the economic house of cards built by ever increasing deficits. Our growing trade imbalance, the failure of the agricultural economy, the difficulties experienced in the steel and textile industries, the record high dollar, and consistently high interest rates will only grow worse unless Federal spending is brought under control.

When farmers go too deeply in debt, they are foreclosed on. When a small businessman's income is exceeded by his expenses, he shuts down. When a family's borrowing is more than its paychecks can carry, they lose their home. When will our Federal debt force us into economic oblivion?

I urge my colleagues to carefully consider the resolution I have introduced today. It offers us the opportunity to permanently restore the economic health of our Nation. The mood of the American people should be enough to convince each Member of Congress that the time is right for this amendment. Clearly, if Congress is to act, it must act soon.●

SYNTHETIC FUELS: OUR ENERGY SECURITY

HON. MICHAEL L. (MIKE) STRANG

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. STRANG. Mr. Speaker, today the legislative process began for yet another ill-conceived assault on the U.S. Synthetic Fuels Program which was set in motion 5 years ago, when the Congress passed the Energy Security Act of 1980.

Hearings today in the House Energy Subcommittee on Fossil and Synthetic Fuels center on H.R. 935, a bill that proposes to abolish the Synthetic Fuels Corporation [SFC] and all the letters of intent the SFC has signed with various fledgling synthetic fuel projects, including two shale oil production facilities in Colorado. With estimated recoverable reserves of 600 billion barrels of shale oil, oil shale development in the Green River formation of northwestern Colorado is the preeminent energy bank available to the United States for long-term energy security.

Before rushing to judgment on this matter, I encourage my colleagues to consider the following testimony which I presented to the hearing today.

Mr. Chairman, Members of the Subcommittee, thank you for this opportunity to present my views about this legislation which proposes to abolish the Synthetic Fuels Corporation [SFC]. I respectfully request that you give very careful, thoughtful consideration of my comments before acting on this legislation in haste. If this legislation were to pass the Subcommittee, the Full Committee and, by some misfortune, should it be sanctioned by the House, it will represent a debilitating blow to our national goal and expectation of energy independence. Ultimately, it would be a major blow to our national security.

I speak from personal knowledge and involvement in oil shale technology as a former State Legislator and private citizen. I live in the middle of the region of Northwest Colorado which is proud to be the home of the most extensive, high quality oil shale reserves in the world. This part of the Third Congressional District has witnessed the ups and downs of the oil shale industry.

and the historical Federal participation dating back to World War II. But my interest is not so parochial as at first many of you may believe.

Beyond any question, by any rational thinking person, the over 600 billion barrels of recoverable shale oil locked in the shale formations of Northwestern Colorado, represents the preeminent energy bank available to the United States for long-term energy security. Energy security. That is the driving force behind the actions and commitments of the Congress which, in 1980 on the heels of the most recent, but not the last, oil crisis, established the foundation to make this country energy secure through the development of a domestic synthetic fuels incentive program.

In this moment of emotional, political rhetoric which appears to focus on management concerns, let us not lose sight of the goal to which we committed our Nation in 1980. It took a certain amount of courage for those who were here then to set the course for domestic energy independence and security. Now, some here are using strong-armed tactics, divisive and misleading emotional rhetoric, to destroy what we built. Some may contend this destructive effort takes courage. Well, courage ought to have eyes as well as arms. We must not exploit our immediate preoccupation with the SFC management framework, and close our eyes to the vision of the energy-independent future that we set in motion five years ago.

Peter Drucker once said: "Long-range planning does not deal with future decisions, but with the future of present decisions." That principle must be at the very core of the thinking of this committee and this Congress. I beg of you to act with reason. We must not sacrifice the energy independence and security of this Nation for the sole reason that we are dissatisfied with management. Whatever your concerns may be regarding the operation, management, retirement plans or salary structure of the SFC, those particular matters can be resolved by us by less drastic action and without forsaking the essential quest—to help a fledgling industry get on its feet, to stand alone in the marketplace, and supply our people and our defense systems with a secure source of energy.

We must not allow ourselves, as responsible representatives of the people we serve, to be lulled into complacency by the present socalled "oil glut" in the world. Are our memories so short that we do not remember the gas lines of 1973–74 and 1978–79? How can we possibly feel secure when we know perfectly well that we are still about 30% dependent on energy sources beyond our control, primarily in politically volatile regions of the world. Are we discharging our responsibility by ignoring that; by resting in a national nest of false comfort in our present circumstances? Of course we are not.

Look at the facts. In a recent interview in U.S. News & World Report, Energy Secretary Don Hodel detailed how this nation will have to find 32 billion barrels of new conventional oil reserves during the next ten years, just to keep domestic production at present levels. [I remind the committee that there are an estimated 600 billion barrels of recoverable shale oil in the Green River Formation in Northwestern Colorado.] Secretary Hodel said if exploration and discovery continues merely at current rates, domestic production will decline by almost 2% annually through the rest of the century. He said at that rate, U.S. dependence on imports could increase from about 30% now, to over 50% again by the year 2000.

That is if just the present level of exploration and discovery continues. Synfuels development should be a handmaiden to exploration. It must be, because we are accomplishing precious little else in a while host of domestic energy issues. Consider the facts. Investment in nuclear power plants is virtually zero and it will take three to four decades before the industry and the rest of us can rebuild public confidence. Until we resolve those mistakes of the past and until the nuclear and uranium industries get back on their feet, we must continue to rely on conventional fossil fuels and synthetic fuels to help fill the gap to the ultimate energy sources of the future.

But we are not doing so. We have persistent attacks on the synfuels industry. We have over 88 million acres of public lands locked up and placed out of bounds for oil and gas exploration and development, and some people are working to put millions of more acres in ecological museums, off limits to continued energy and mineral exploration and development. Excessive and ill-conceived laws and regulations are hampering the use of and mining of coal. The Federal government has essentially turned off the spigot to major water and power development. Do we truly understand all that we are doing to this Nation in terms of hampering a viable domestic program of conventional energy development, much less synthetic fuels?

If the American people take a long hard look at all these factors, they must surely conclude that the Congress is being irresponsible in its national energy policy, to the extent we allow one to exist at all.

The Congress and the Administration debated the Synthetic Fuels Corporation at length last year and arrived at a compromise in the FY '85 Supplemental money bill. That compromise struck $5.4 billion from the line of credit initially extended to the SFC when it was created. The SFC now has available about $7.8 billion. I remind the Chairman and Members of the Subcommittee as forcefully as I can, not one red cent has been expended for the two Colorado oil shale projects by the SFC to date. On the other hand, those two projects have invested over $1 billion of their own funds in up-front funding for facility construction and impact mitigation. They, not the American taxpayer, are the ones taking the initial risks; let no one dispute that. What funds remain available to the SFC to draw on are essentially enough to fund the existing eight Letters of Intent for a variety of synfuel technologies. Only four actual contracts are in place. They would be preserved under this legislation. All the others would be cancelled.

Not only are those Letters of Intent good faith commitments from the U.S. government, so too is that compromise agreement worked out by the Congress and the Administration late last year. Under that agreement, and reduced line of credit, the SFC has revised its plans and has taken steps to scale back its policy objectives. The companies involved also took the government at its word, and in good faith revised their plans. The Federal government must not now again renege on the promises, prospects and plans we enunciated to the American people when President Carter appeared before a Joint Session of Congress to plead for a plan to make America energy-independent. That vision was carried out when Congress passed the Energy Security Act of 1980, which established the SFC. We were prepared to meet our national strategic energy needs far into the future.

Mr. Chairman, let me just briefly recite some facts about the two oil shale projects of which I am most familiar—the Union Oil Parachute Creek Oil Shale Project and the Catherdral Bluffs (Cb) Oil Shale Project. Both have Letters of Intent signed by the SFC. Union Oil has invested $683 million in its total first phase project, and another $10 million in planning and preparation for Phase Two, for which the Letter of Intent exists. This project is on privately owned lands. The Cb Project, located on one of the two Colorado Federal Prototype Oil Shale Lease Tracts, has invested about $272 million on its facilities. Cb is in the process of investigating a modified retorting technology in discussions with the SFC.

The Union Phase I project, after several technical and mechanical startup problems, assignable to any pioneering technology program, recently completed a most promising sustained run of 6,000 barrels of shale oil. Work is progressing well. Union Oil President Fred Hartly has made a personal commitment to seeing this project through. He is well on his way, at considerable expense, not to the taxpayers, but to his stockholders. They are taking all the risks at this point. Not until production begins does the SFC contract come into play. The product will be refined at the nearby Gary Refinery in Fruita, Colorado and transported to the Air Force as part of its "Project: Rivet Shale," to validate the use of shale oil derived JP-4 aviation fuel in operational aircraft. To stress the importance the this program, the Air Force said in its project summary: "Twice in the past ten years, the Air Force stocks of jet fuel were seriously depleted because of curtailed oil supply to the U.S. . . . . To the extent we fail to develop [a] domestic energy alternate to conventional petroleum, the U.S. will become increasingly reliant on imported oil whose sources cannot be guaranteed."

Union Oil's shale property holdings alone contain 1.6 billion barrels of recoverable shale oil in high-yield deposits. These reserves are sufficient to produce 100,000 barrels per day of shale oil for nearly 45 years. There are a couple billion more barrels in lesser grade oil shale available to the project.

Now, let me present part of the financial picture that is often missing by those who profess to be protecting the public from the perceived synfuels boondoggle. Last year, and even this year, critics cite a GAO Report on the Union Phase II project. The media reports and Congressional misrepresentations highlight the GAO worst-case projection that by 1989 the guaranteed price for the shale oil product would be $92 per barrel. The rest of the facts, which go unreported and unmentioned in the rhetoric are these:

The GAO devoted only one short paragraph in a 33 page report to discussing the projected 1989 guaranteed price;

The GAO drew no conclusions that the price guarantee was improper or unwise;

The GAO merely stated the obvious—that 1989 dollars will be worth less than 1983 dollars because of inflation; also

Media reports failed to address adequately, the revenue sharing agreement in the Union-SFC Letter of Intent that provides for recovery by the SFC of part or all of the price guarantees over the life of the project;

The GAO report indicated that, under the same set of SFC assumptions that would result in a 1989 price guarantee of $92 per barrel, the SFC would stand to recover from Union almost $3.2 billion (in spent dollars) in revenue sharing payments over the life of the contract:

Media reports also cited $3.2 billion in tax incentives that Union Oil would receive for constructing and operating the plant. The reports and the GAO Report failed to mention that about 90 percent of those incentives are available to any mining and/or industrial venture, and that over its life, the plant would pay much more in federal taxes than it received in federal tax incentives.

It should be understood, that included in the front-end costs already invested by the company, is nearly $63 million in social and community development impact mitigation, meaning: new schools, new government facilities, new housing projects, law enforcement assistance, water and sewer facilities, and many more people projects. Those are the facts.

As for Phase I of the Union Oil Shale Project, again, for which no Federal tax dollars have been paid by the SFC, once production begins, the contract with the SFC and DoD is to supply 10,000 barrels per day of diesel and jet fuel. During the first seven years of the ten year contract, the DoD will pay the market price. If the market price is below the contract price, Union will receive payments from the SFC to make up the difference. Over the first seven years, the contract allows those payments to total no more than $400 million. These payments are subject to normal federal and state income tax. If the then-current market price is above the contract price, the project will receive no payments from the SFC. These are the rest of the facts about the Union oil shale project.

One more matter, Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee: there are other extensive and vital minerals associated with oil shale deposits that are just as important to our national security. The minerals are nahcolite and dawsonite, both sodium compounds. Nahcolite is pure sodium bicarbonate [baking soda]. Dawsonite is an aluminum compound.

The largest domestic source of raw nahcolite and dawsonite is found in this same oil shale area of Northwestern Colorado. There is an estimated 30 billion tons of recoverable nahcolite. The electric utility industry has accomplished tests that prove nahcolite to be an effective dry scrubbing agent for flue gases from coal fired power plants. Nacholite has proven to be more effective and less expensive than other control technology. What is needed is a reliable domestic supply line to make it viable. Nahcolite is also being discussed now as an effective neutralizing agent to help lakes recover from acid rain contamination.

Currently, the U.S. imports virtually all of the alumina raw materials [bauxite and alumina] we require. Enough alumina to produce over five million tons of aluminum metal is imported annually. That is 90 percent of total U.S. consumption. Development of these minerals along with oil shale in the Green River Formation of Northwestern Colorado could significantly improve U.S. self-sufficiency, help our balance of payments position, and free us from this much too excessive reliance on foreign sources of these minerals.

Mr. Chairman, this legislation to abolish the SFC and these crucial national security programs is short-sighted. We must not yield to temporary moves to remedy whatever immediate management problems may exist within the SFC corporate structure. We must not theaten the concept and commitments we have made to our people, to act in a responsible manner and foster a sound synthetic fuels productive capacity to meet the future requirements tht will undoubtedly be upon us in the not too distant future. I appeal to you not to close your eyes to the vision we must apply to the future energy security of this Nation and our people.

Thank you.●

SALUTING JOHN SHERIDAN

HON. JIM COURTER

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. COURTER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call to my colleagues attention a great public servant to the State of New Jersey, Transportation Commissioner John P. Sheridan. As Commissioner Sheridan will soon be leaving this position after a job well done, it is fitting that he be honored for his innumerable accomplishments.

As a densely populated State, it is imperative that New Jersey have a most efficent road, and mass transportation network. John Sheridan has met the challenges of ensuring this brillantly. He has prudently administered a budget that has nearly tripled in size since he was sworn into office 3 years ago. This has been done as the bureaucratic structure of the State Department of Transportation has been scaled back. Meanwhile, major interstate roads such as I-78, I-195, and I-295 are heading toward completion. Substantial work has also been done on Route 56 and progress is continuing on Routes 17, 18 and 24.

Commissioner Sheridan has also been responsible for administering the State's largest resurfacing program ever, the Bridge Bond Act, that will produce $377 million in bridge rehabilitation programs.

Mr. Sheridan's adminstrative ingenuity has also helped free New Jersey counties from Federal redtape by substituting State dollars for Federal ones. This program is expected to provide as much as 50 percent more construction for the same amount of money. The department of transportation in turn will place the Federal dollars to work on major regional highway projects that were previously without a source of funds.

As commissioner of transportation, John Sheridan has the corresponding responsibility to serve as chairman of the board of New Jersey transit. This organization provides vital rail and bus service to New Jerseyans. Under Commissioner Sheridan, the system has been expanded, upgraded, and managed in a most financially sound manner.

All New Jerseyans can be thankful that they have been served by such an honorable man as James P. Sheridan. He has been a model public offical and offers encouragement and inspiration for all who are involved in Government.●

DELTA COLLEGE 50TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. RICHARD H. LEHMAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. LEHMAN of California. Mr. Speaker, on May 17, 1985, San Joaquin Delta College of Stockton, CA, will celebrate its 50th anniversary. This is a notable achievement for a fine institution.

Interest in the concept of junior colleges in California began in Fresno in 1910. There followed tentative attempts in Stockton in 1917—which failed due to inadequate enrollment—and in 1920, when the Stockton Board of Education formally agreed upon an institution but provided no funds for its establishment.

In 1934, the College of the Pacific coordinating committee recommended the formation of a lower division program to admit high school students not fully qualified for regular Pacific admission. The plan was put into motion in February 1934 as College of the Pacific Junior College, with an initial enrollment of 73 students. Pacific officials offered to turn the program over to the Stockton Board of Education, and Stockton Junior College was formed later that year.

The success of the junior college operation was so notable that College of the Pacific abandoned freshman and sophomore instruction in the spring of 1936, bequeathing all such instruction to the junior college. The two institutions shared facilities through World War II.

Stockton Junior College became Stockton College in 1948, with a total enrollment of just under 2,000. Classes were also moved to a 42-acre site just south of College of the Pacific. The physical separation of College of the Pacific and Stockton College was followed in 1951 by the resumption of lower division classes at Pacific.

In the next decade the educational needs of the area became greater than the geographical focus of Stockton College, and San Joaquin Delta College became its successor. Legally separated from the Stockton Unified School District in 1963, the college encompassed virtually all of San Joaquin County and portions of three other counties. In the ensuing years, attempts to develop a Delta multicampus system met with limited success until 1969, when $19.8 million in construction bonds coupled with funding from six other sources served as the base for construction of Delta's first permanent home over the next 7 years.

San Joaquin Delta College is an accredited public, tuition-free, 2-year community college with the main campus located on 165 acres at 5151 Pacific Avenue in Stockton, CA. The college operates an educational farm on 157 acres near Manteca, a forestry field study area of 83 acres near Mountain Ranch, and conducts evening classes in most communities of the college district as well as in the main campus. The Delta College district has grown to some 2,300 square miles, larger than Rhode Island or Delaware, and now serves approximately 20,000 students.

Mr. Speaker, San Joaquin Delta College has offered diverse educational opportunities for cental Californians for 50 outstanding years, and I am pleased to offer it my congratulations and best wishes for continued success and achievement.●

FATHER DAMIAN COLICCHIO IS NAMED "HACKENSACK UNICO'S MAN OF THE YEAR"

HON. ROBERT G. TORRICELLI

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. TORRICELLI. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor Father Damian Colicchio, of Hackensack, NJ, who was recently named "Hackensack Unico's Man of the Year." As a teacher, scholar, and community leader, Father Damian is an inspiration to his parish and the people of Hackensack.

As pastor of St. Francis parish in Hackensack, Father Damian has devoted his energies to the spiritual renewal of his people. Faced with a debilitating debt, the parish turned toward Father Damian for guidance. His untiring efforts led to new found rewards and, today, the parish debt is less than one-half of what it had been just 5 years ago. The parish has once again become a vital center for religious and social activity.

Father Damian has devoted countless hours to the parish council and the local school board and has become a positive force in the community at large. Educated in theology and philosophy, Father Damian has a keen understanding of the Judeo-Christian values which are the foundation of our society. As a public figure, Father Damian has personified the principles of honesty and integrity. He brings a natural dignity to every project he undertakes.

Father Damian has touched hundreds of lives both in Hackensack and across Bergen County. Possessed with a natural ability to bring comfort to those in distress and words of support to those who need it, Father Damian is always available to an individual in an hour of need.

It has been said that faith is not taught by arguments. It is taught by lives. Throughout his life Father Damian has demonstrated the quality of service above self, which has made him Hackensack Unico's Man of the Year. I join with the members of Unico in Hackensack and throughout New Jersey, in wishing Father Damian continued health and happiness. I am confident that he will continue to be a teacher for us all for many years to come.●

INTERSTATE BANKING LEGISLATION

HON. DAVID DREIER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. DREIER of California. Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege for me to join with my distinguished colleague from California, Mr. SHUMWAY, in introducing legislation that would establish a balanced and reasonable policy on interstate banking. Today, in spite of statutory provisions which prohibit interstate banking, a large and ever increasing amount of interstate banking takes place. That activity is carried on both by banks and by nonbank financial institutions. The time has clearly arrived for Congress to review and clarify national policy toward interstate banking.

The bill we introduce today will help fill that critical void in Federal banking law. It calls for phased in interstate banking, a consensus approach developed first by the Association of Bank Holding Companies and endorsed by such industry groups as the California Bankers Association and the Association of Reserve City Bankers. In testimony during a hearing in the Financial Institutions Subcommittee this morning, Federal Reserve Chairman Paul Volcker expressed his support for the bill's general approach to interstate banking via the holding company structure. I'm confident that the approach we've adopted will be endorsed by our colleagues on the Banking Committee and others in the House as a whole.

Apart from the fact that Congress needs to recognize market advances and update banking laws governing interstate banking, there are some important consumer benefits to be gained from interstate banking expansion. Empirical evidence compiled by the Federal Reserve Bank of Kansas City, for instance, "suggests that interstate banking would likely result in a more competitive banking system" and that "the removal of prohibitions against interstate banking, would, in fact, result in substantial benefits if it led to new banks being opened in protected local markets." Those benefits are better, cheaper banking services for both the consumer and the businessman.

I also like to believe that our home State of California serves as a testament to the benefits of interstate banking. In California today, we have huge money center banks, large aggressive foreign banks, medium-sized banks that serve middle-market customers as well as hundreds of independent neighborhood banks. They've all been able to thrive in a hotly contested market, with no single bank having an edge simply because of its size. As Chairman Volcker noted in his testimony this morning.

> The competitive environment [In California] appears healthy, with the consumer and the businessman able to choose between some of the largest banking institutions in the world and small locally owned banks. Should banks be permitted to expand interstate more freely, we would anticipate similar patterns to prevail.

Let me outline briefly what our bill calls for:

First, effective upon enactment, congressional sanction would be given to legislation authorizing regional interstate banking arrangements.

Second, effective 2 years after enactment, a bank holding company would be permitted to acquire other bank holding companies: In any contiguous State; in any State within the same Federal Reserve district as the acquiring bank holding company; if the home State of the holding company is part of two Federal Reserve Bank districts, in any State within both districts; except that "Leapfrogging" would be prohibited.

Third, effective 4 years after enactment, a bank holding company would be permitted to acquire other bank holding companies anywhere in the country.

I believe this phased in approach to interstate banking is a reasonable, positive proposal. Pointing again to California, our consumers and our diverse and dynamic economy have benefited enormously from the healthy competition of the California banking industry. By allowing banks to compete on an interstate scale, we will bring similar benefits to the Nation as a whole. Most important, our bill calls for interstate expansion through a holding company structure—not through interstate branching. This will allay fears of those who are concerned that small, independent banks will be swallowed up by their larger competitors. It also helps preserve and strengthen the dual banking system.

In conclusion, let me commend my colleague from California for his initiative and leadership on this issue. I look forward to working with him and the members of the House Banking

Committee in promoting this important bill.●

MARK THOMPSON OF THE FORT WORTH STAR TELEGRAM WINS PULITZER PRIZE FOR REPORTING

HON. MARTIN FROST

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. FROST. Mr. Speaker, the Fort Worth Star Telegram must certainly be proud of their Washington reporter, Mark Thompson, today.

Mark has been announced as the winner of the Pulitzer Prize for public service reporting—for a series of articles concerning the safety of Bell helicopters.

Mark Thompson has been with the newspaper since 1979, having come from Oakland, MI. His 32 years of age include having graduated from East Greenwich High School in East Greenwich, RI, graduating magna cum laud from Boston University, while majoring in public communication and American history, and now winning the coveted Pulitzer Prize in his chosen field of journalism.

May he wear his acquired recognition for excellence well, as I know he will, and I inform the House of this accomplishment today as a point of pride for the State of Texas.●

HYDROELECTRIC RELICENSING

HON. AL SWIFT

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. SWIFT. Mr. Speaker, recently Mr. MATSUI introduced the Fair Competition in Hydroelectric Licensing Act. Although I am not a cosponsor of Mr. MATSUI's bill, I would like to take this opportunity to commend his efforts to search for a fair compromise in the hotly contested matter of relicensing hydroelectric dams.

The Federal Water Power Act of 1920 was passed after 15 years of debate. It established that both investor-owned and customer-owned utilities would be entitled to build and operate hydroelectric facilities utilizing the Nation's waterways. It set up a competitive system to decide between applicants for the same site.

The standard used to judge between competing applicants is, Which one has submitted an application that is best adapted to the public interest? Whichever applicant wins the competition is given a license, with a typical term of 50 years. In the event of a tie—in other words, if both applications are equally well adapted to the public interest—Congress decided that the license should be awarded to the customer-owned utility.

No one is trying to change this system.

The debate is not over the initial licensing stage. It is over what standards should apply when the initial license expires, and the licensee applies for renewal of the license. There are four major issues raised by this controversy:

First, should an existing licensee who wishes to renew its license receive an automatic renewal?

Second, in the event that Congress decides not to automatically renew licenses at the relicensing stage, what criteria should be used to determine which applicant's plans will best serve the public interest?

Third, in the case of a tie between applicants, should the same preference for customer-owned utilities which exists at the initial licensing stage, also apply at relicensing, or should ties be broken in favor of existing licensees? Alternatively, should ties simply be made impossible?

Fourth, if the license is transferred to a new licensee, after a determination that the new licensee will better serve the public interest, what compensation should the new licensee pay to the old licensee? Should the compensation standard be the same regardless of whether the old licensee is a customer-owned or investor-owned utility?

The Fair Competition in Hydroelectric Licensing Act would apply the same preference, in the case of ties, in relicensing proceedings as exists in initial licensing proceedings. However, it would eliminate the right that customer-owned utilities presently have to amend their license applications after seeing the investor-owned applicant's proposal. The bill also recognizes that some fair level of compensation, beyond net investment, should be paid if the license is transferred. In addition, the bill contains important provisions requiring environmental and energy conservation factors to be considered in issuing licenses. I believe that overall the bill represents a first cut at fairly resolving these issues.

This said, it is also important to recognize that the existing licensees have generally done a good job in operating these dams, and would probably continue to do so. Mr. SHELBY has introduced the Electric Consumers Protection Act, which would establilsh a resumption in favor of automatically renewing the existing licensee's license. I have some reservations about Mr. SHELBY's bill, particularly by its complete repeal of preference in relicensing proceedings. However, in shaping legislation on this issue, I believe that Congress must always keep in mind the effect of any legislation on the ratepayers, whether they are served by investor-owned or customer-owned utilities. Furthermore, such legislation should encourage competition, because competition has proven to be the surest guarantee that the public interest is served.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank Mr. MATSUI for introducing a bill which gives hope to those of us who believe that a middle ground exists to solve this issue, a middle ground where investor-owned and customer-owned utilities—and, most importantly, their ratepayers—can all be winners. I am confident that if all parties are willing to make fair compromises, we will be able to pass relicensing legislation in this Congress that will serve the public interest well for many decades.●

VOTES ON HOUSE RESOLUTIONS

HON. WEBB FRANKLIN

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. FRANKLIN. Mr. Speaker, due to weather conditions, I was detained in the Memphis airport for 10 hours on Monday, April 22 and was unable to reach Washington for the votes that took place. If I had been here, I would have voted "yes" on House Concurrent Resolution 67, the bill providing grandparents the right to petition the courts for visitation privileges with their grandchildren following divorce, separation, or death of the grandchildren's parents and "yes" on House Resolution 125, condemning the Soviet Government for the murder of Maj. Arthur D. Nicholson, Jr., and actions inconsistent with the 1947 Military Liaison Missions Agreement. Also I would have voted "no" on House Concurrent Resolution 52.●

A BILL FOR THE RELIEF OF SUSAN M. AGCAOILI

HON. DON YOUNG

OF ALASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Mr. Speaker, Susan M. Agcaoili is a native and citizen of the Philippines, currently residing in the Philippines. She is the daughter of the late Jose B. Mesa, who served on behalf of the Allied cause during World War II in the Philippines. Jose B. Mesa served as a first lieutenant in the Allied Intelligence Bureau, working primarily for the American cause. In return for his service on behalf of the Allied cause, Jose B. Mesa was promised American citizenship for him and his family. Mr. de Mesa's goal was to obtain American citizenship for himself and his family, and to unite his family in the United States of America.

When Mr. de Mesa died in 1962, he had not yet fulfilled his dream of obtaining American citizenship for himself and his family. Although Mr. de Mesa is deceased, his dream of uniting his family in the United States as American citizens is still as relevant today as it was after the war. Mr. de Mesa's wife, Mrs. Lourdes de Mesa, did manage to relocate in the United States, and through naturalization became an American citizen. However, the naturalization took place after her children were grown, and now her daughter, Susan M. Agcaoili is married and resides in the Philippines. Because of the visa availability for the fourth preference category for "adult children" is backlogged for many years in the Philippines, it is unlikely that Mrs. de Mesa will be able to achieve the objective she and her husband intended since Mr. de Mesa served in World War II: to unite their family, as American citizens, in the country that Mr. de Mesa served honorably.

The promise made to Mr. de Mesa that he would receive U.S. citizenship for himself and his family in return for his military service was a manifestation of U.S. immigration legislation during World War II. In March 1942, the Nationality Act of 1940 was amended by the Second War Powers Act of 1942 (56 Stat. 1786 et seq. Sections 701-705) were added to the Nationality Act of 1940. These sections were enacted to liberalize the requirements for citizenship for alien servicemen who served outside the continental limits of the United States. In a subsequent amendment, Congress dictated that all petitions filed under these sections had to be filed no later than December 31, 1946.

Pursuant to the act, between 1943 and 1946, officers of the Immigration and Naturalization Service ["INS"] were sent to overseas military posts to carry out the naturalization of eligible members of the U.S. Armed Forces. In the Philippines, however, naturalization of alien servicemen was impossible because of the Japanese occupation. After the liberation of the Philippines, however, implementation of the Act commenced.

In August 1945, the INS sent a representative to Manila to naturalize aliens. Shortly thereafter, the U.S. Government withdrew the authorization of the INS representative because there was some concern that there would be a mass exodus from the Philippines of all Filipinos who served in the army on behalf of the Allied cause. Thus, as of October 1945, no further naturalizations were permitted in the Philippines. Subsequently, in August 1946, another naturalization agent was appointed and authorized to operate in the Philippines. Between August 1946 and December 31, 1946, when the act expired, approximately 4,000 Filipinos were naturalized under section 702 of the act.

Thus, out of a possible 17 months (between August 1945 and December 1946) when the act should have been operative in the Philippines (permitting the naturalization of Filipino World War II veterans, including Jose B. de Mesa), the act was only operative for approximately 8 months. During the 9-month period, between October 1945 and August 1946, the authorization of the INS representative was revoked, thereby precluding the naturalization of Filipino World War II veterans.

Thus, despite the promise of American citizenship for Jose B. de Mesa in return for his service on behalf of the Allied cause during World War II, Mr. de Mesa was not able to take advantage of the opportunity, in large part due to the failure to fully implement the act in the Philippines. In fact, the connection between the failure to fully implement the Second War Powers Act of 1942 in the Philippines and the subsequent inability of Filipino World War II veterans to gain their U.S. citizenship has already been documented. One court held that the failure to fully implement the act violated the due process rights of Filipino veterans who had applied for citizenship subsequent to the expiration of the act in December 1946. Matter of Naturalization of 68 Filipino War Vets, 406 F. Supp. 931 (N.D. Cal. 1975). The end result is that Mr. de Mesa's dream of uniting his family in the United States as American citizens, a dream which his service on behalf of the Allied Forces entitled him, was never fulfilled.

Mrs. Lourdes de Mesa is an elderly woman, and her hopes of fulfilling her and her husband's dream may never be accomplished if Susan M. Agcaoili is forced to rely on the fourth preference category to immigrate from the Philippines. Mrs. de Mesa has attempted to work through various administrative channels, but, to this point, she has been completely unsuccessful. Mrs. de Mesa's efforts have simply resulted in more frustration.

U.S. Army records fail to reflect her late husband's service, despite a wealth of evidence that he did serve, not the least of which is her first-hand recollection of her husband being taken prisoner by the Japanese Imperial Army.

Mr. de Mesa fulfilled his obligation to the United States by serving on behalf of the Allied cause during World War II. The United States should fulfill its obligation to the late Mr. de Mesa by uniting the remaining family members in America as permanent residents of, and eventually citizens of, the United States.

Today, I am introducing a private relief bill for Susan M. Agcaoili. The purpose of this bill is to grant permanent residency in the United States to her. Passage of this bill will enable the United States of America to fulfill its promise to Jose B. de Mesa's family with U.S. citizenship in return for his honorable service on behalf of the United States during World War II.●

GOOD GUY OF THE YEAR

HON. CHESTER G. ATKINS

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. ATKINS. Mr. Speaker, this week George P. "Chubby" Legrand, Jr., the commissioner of Public Works in Lowell, MA, is being honored by the Lowell Lions Charities and the Retarded Adults Rehabilitative Association of Greater Lowell, Inc., as their "Good Guy of the Year."

This is a man, Mr. Speaker, whom we often talk about in Washington but rarely see. A loving husband, a father of four children, a grandfather of 11, a veteran of World War II with the SeaBees, he has served the people of Lowell almost all of his adult life—for the last 23 years as their commissioner of public works. This job, which is so demanding, has been performed with skill and professionalism by Chubby.

What makes Chubby so remarkable, Mr. Speaker, is that he is the embodiment of sharing and caring. No request is too small, no voice too weak, no hour too late for Chubby to be responsive. But Mr. Speaker, we should also know that no job was ever too big for this man.

His shoulders are broad enough to accept not only his family responsibilities and his professional career, but also to provide leadership in virtually every major community organization. Among the groups to which Chubby belongs, and is characteristically active in, are the following: board of directors of St. John's Men's Guild, Lowell Boy's Club, Lowell Kiwanis Club, Men of Merrimack, Veterans of Foreign Wars, The American Legion, 58th SeaBee Association, Holy Name Society, Merrimack Valley Catholic Charities, American Red Cross, National Audubon Society, the American Forestry Association, Massachusetts Highway Association, and the American Public Works Association.

His life is a reflection of his religious faith and he has become a living example of that faith for those of us who know him. Mr. Speaker, it is with pride that I rise today to point to George P. "Chubby" Legrand, Jr., as a man truly worthy of our attention in the Congress today.●

IMPROVING GRADUATE EDUCATION

HON. E. THOMAS COLEMAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. COLEMAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, in the next few months Congress will be undertaking the reauthorization of the Higher Education Act. The purpose of this reauthorization will be to extend many of the valuable programs currently authorized under the act and to refine the law to reflect current trends and needs in higher education through the 1990's. One such area in need of attention is graduate education.

The health of the graduate education and research enterprise is one of the most significant educational issues this country faces. The Nation depends heavily upon its universities to produce its most fundamental research and for each new generation of scholars and scientists.

Higher education as a whole expanded rapidly between 1958 and 1970 because of the impact of Sputnik, an increasing college age population generating demand for new faculty, and a growing economy needing highly trained people. During that time, total graduate enrollment grew from 314,000 to 816,000, an increase of 160 percent. Federal support for graduate education grew from approximately 7,500 stipend awards in 1954 to an estimated 80,000 in 1969. Graduate enrollments continued to rise in the 1970's, although at substantially reduced rates from the previous decade, while Federal support for graduate education began to decline. This decline can be attributed to a worsening labor market, declining rates of increase in undergraduate enrollment, and economic strains brought on by the Vietnam war.

Federal support for graduate education has dwindled significantly since the 1960's. Although this loss has been compensated for in part by institutions and State resources, corporate and foundation support, and increases in self-supporting students, there is clearly a need for more resources to attract highly talented students into areas of national need.

Our graduate enterprise is showing signs of distress. In their 1983 report to Congress, the National Commission on Student Financial Assistance reported that "serious signs of trouble and erosion" were identified in graduate education. The report identified the major problems affecting graduate education such as: A shortage American doctoral talent in critical areas of national need; quality faculty in essential fields leaving the classroom for higher paying careers in business and industry; many promising graduate students are deterred from pursuing graduate education because of the tremendous student loan debt burdens they must take on to do so; the surrender of our preeminence in many of the science disciplines to scientists abroad; and the obsolete state of many of our university laboratories and libraries.

Today I have introduced legislation to address, in part, the weaknesses facing graduate education. The legislation adds a new part D to title IX of the Higher Education Act. The new part D would provide funds on a competitive basis to institutions to set up graduate fellowship programs within specific disciplines of national need. Institutions would develop their own criteria for selecting fellows, ability and demonstrated financial need would be major considerations in the selection process. Each fellowship would be three-fold, students would receive (1) a fellowship award for living expenses; (2) tuition and fees; and the institution would receive (3) a small grant to enhance the academic department.

Not having trained, highly educated people in critical fields has already been costly to our economy and national security but we have much more to lose. This legislation will have little impact on Federal spending, but will pay large dividends in the long term. I believe that proposals such as this represent the direction we should take the Higher Education Act in this reauthorization.

I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting this legislation.●

CENTRAL AMERICA

HON. RICHARD A. GEPHARDT

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. GEPHARDT. Mr. Speaker, our country has long resisted change in Central America. Last night's House vote against military aid to the Contras confirms that most Americans want a change. They don't buy the administration's rhetoric that the Contras are "the moral equivalent of the Founding Fathers." They want to preserve our interests, but they sense the old ways will no longer work.

Military escalation is part of the problem, not the solution. Our 30-plus interventions in the area since 1900 have not produced long-run stability and peace. Military aid has always allowed the right wing to think it didn't need to compromise. Guatemala, where the CIA intervened 31 years ago to depose a socialist government, today faces a simmering revolt repressed by a rightist dictatorship.

The Reagan policy won't put the Contras back in power. No one I talked with during my recent trip to Central America believes the Contras can win. The Contras can't win because they lack the political identity required to advance their cause; $14 million won't change this; $80 million hasn't.

The administration's harsh rhetoric strengthens Sandinista hardliners. The CIA-backed minings and assassination manuals, the Contra attacks on civilians and our President's bellicosity deny Sandinista moderates the opportunity to present a credible political alternative to their own people. We invite the extremism Reagan complains of.

Reagan hasn't faced the hard reality that Americans won't support armed intervention unless it is clear that other possibilities for a settlement have been exhausted. And they haven't. Why hasn't he relied more extensively on other tools at his disposal? And why does he recognize the regime if he believes it illegitimate?

The American people want a policy that offers us prospects for constructive change. They want to attempt negotiations before plunging us into a war.

The negotiations initiated by the Contadora nations of Venezuela, Colombia, Panama, and Mexico represent an excellent start. An agreement along the lines suggested by the Contadora group would require the Sandinistas to expel foreign military advisers, keep foreign military bases and offensive weapons out of the country and desist from exporting arms. We would need to insist on provisions to ensure that the Sandinistas are not violating these terms. If violations occurred, we could take steps to isolate them diplomatically or suspend trade. As a last resort, the Rio treaty would give us a legal foundation for the use of military force.●

HON. WILLIAM F. CLINGER, JR.

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. CLINGER. Mr. Speaker, I was unavoidably absent from the floor of the House of Representatives for rollcall No. 59, the vote on approving the Journal of Thursday, April 18, because I was attending a very important meeting of the House Republican Conference on the subject of the McIntyre seat. Had I been present, I would have voted "No."●

BRIDGE ASSISTANCE

HON. DON SUNDQUIST

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. SUNDQUIST. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation that would make certain off-system bridge projects funded by State and local services eligible for Federal bridge assistance. This bridge replacement program has been a demonstration project in Tennessee for the past 2 years under section 132 of the Surface Transportation Act of 1982. Because of its immediate success, it was recently extended in Tennessee for an additional 2 years. Specifically, it has proved to be extremely successful in enabling Tennessee to initiate a State-funded bridge program that promptly and efficiently addresses the bridge problem at the local level.

Under this legislation, States will be able to initiate a State-funded program for local bridges and then receive matching credit on the Federal Bridge Program for the expenditures the State makes each year in replacing deficient off-system bridges. Tennessee's experience under section 132 has clearly demonstrated that a State can eliminate lengthy reviews by the Federal Highway Administration and other Federal agencies and greatly accelerate the replacement of deficient off-system bridges at a lower cost than normally experienced under the regular Federal off-system program.

For example, under the section 132 program, Tennessee replaced 1,219 off-system bridges in 2 years at an average cost of $38.22 per square foot. During that same 2 years under the regular Federal off-system program, Tennessee replaced only 144 bridges and the average cost per square foot of these 144 bridges was $47.50 even though the design and construction standards for both programs were the same. The savings in cost and time were due primarily to the elimination of Federal redtape and lengthy reviews by the Federal Highway Administration and other Federal agencies. I might add the program has been strongly supported by local officials because of the quick attention paid to local bridge problems through this demonstration project.

I urge my colleagues to support this legislation. Because the program demonstrated in Tennessee has been such an overall success, I believe all States should have the opportunity to take advantage of it.●

BITBURG—SOUTH AFRICA POLICY

HON. CHARLES B. RANGEL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. RANGEL. Mr. Speaker, I am dismayed at the callous insensitivity of President Reagan who proposes to participate in a commemorative ceremony at the Bitburg Cemetary where one-seventh of those buried were members of the infamous Nazi SS. Participation in such an event can only be considered an affront to the memory of the over 12 million civilians who were slaughtered, often under the supervision of the SS, during the Second World War, as well as to the memory of the over 77,000 U.S. soldiers killed in the Battle of the Bulge.

While I wholeheartedly support the President's desire to hold a ceremony of reconciliation with the German people, certainly a more fitting symbol of our friendship could have been found. Either a visit to the Konrad Adenauer grave site or a ceremony celebrating Germany's strong postwar democratic traditions would have made the necessary statement. The German people are today a strong and trusted member of the Western Alliance and they deserve to be treated with respect. But respect for Germany cannot be achieved at the expense of offending the innocent victims of the Nazi SS or American veterans who fought, and in many cases died, in an effort to expunge the blight of Nazi tyranny. We must never forget that Hitler entrusted the SS with the responsibility of exterminating all those not of pure "Aryan" descent.

We all make mistakes, and clearly, President Reagan has made one in agreeing to go to the Bitburg Cemetry. I call upon the President to recognize the pain that his decision has caused the American people and to cancel his visit to the Bitburg Cemetery.

Similarly, we should not be surprised when the President makes the same mistake when it comes to his dealings with the South African Government. In his effort to placate the South African Government, he has offended the sensitivities of the American public through his so-called policy of "Constructive engagement" which would more aptly be named friendly persuasion. But such a benign policy can only outrage the sensitivities of the American public and the world at large.

For as it proved to be impossible to come to terms with the racists who ran Nazi Germany, there seems little, if any, hope that the racist South African leadership will be persuaded of the wrong headedness of their policies. And there are many parallels to be drawn between South Africa's treatment of its black population and Nazi Germany's treatment of the Jews.

Both nations adopted a series of prohibitions designed to single out for scorn and contempt and finally the murder of their unwanted populations. Both South Africa and Nazi Germany adopted prohibitions on the right to vote, on the freedom of movement, on intermarriage, on the trades that could be engaged in, on where one could live, and when these were not enough both resorted to authorizing the state police to brutally murder individuals from the unwanted populations.

As the world failed to condem Nazi Germany for its crimes against humanity, President Reagan today fails to condemn the racist South African regime and in so doing bring shame on America. We should have learned from our experience with Nazi Germany, unfortunately this administration fails to see the racist parallels.

Just as the President does not belong at the grave sight of the Nazi SS because his participation in a ceremony where they are honored offends the basic decency of the American public, the U.S. failure to disengage politically and economically with the South African Government offends the American people's basic concept of justice. I urge all those who sympathize with what I have to say about the President's insensitivity to racism to let him know, and then maybe we will be able to get his attention.●

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, we should be reminded that this month of April marks "National Child Abuse Prevention Month." It is a time to not only remember that success we have had in combating this problem—but also to recognize that we still have a long way to go.

As a newly elected Member of the House in 1970, one of the very first bills that I introduced addressed this issue. During my 23-year career in the New York City Police Department, I witnessed first hand the recurring problem of child abuse. I also witnessed the inability of State and local officials to combat the problem because they not only lacked the legal tools—but also lacked adequate resources.

Out of a recognition for a national solution—for a national problem—the 1974 Child Abuse Prevention and Treatment Act was passed by Congress. Its purpose was to encourage States to enact laws that would prevent the problem—as well as help to treat its victims. In 1978, I authored an amendment to the law that expanded the definition of child abuse to include sexual abuse of children. This was necessary in order to respond to the growing problem of child pornography that still remains one of the most horrid crimes of this century.

With the passage of the 1974 and subsequent 1978 amendments, we not only provided recognition to this problem, but we also witnessed a startling increase in the number of reported cases—which pointed to the fact that the problem was in fact bigger than anyone ever expected it to be.

We do know with certainty that the number of reported cases continues to rise—and have risen dramatically since passage of the 1974 act. In 1976, the American Home Association found that 413,000 cases of child abuse had been reported to State and local authorities that year. Within 5 years, that number had doubled to 851,000. Within the last 2 years, this number has climbed an added 12 percent. These numbers are compounded by the fact that only a small fraction of cases are reported—some guess the numbers are only the tip of the iceberg and represent from 10 to 20 percent of the actual problem.

In recognition of Child Abuse Prevention Month, it is important to underscore the value of adequately funded child abuse programs in order to provide appropriate and adequate services for abused children and their families. In response to the growing recognition of the problem—stemming from growing numbers of reports of abuse in day care centers—Congress adopted an amendment last year that added $25 million to the social services block grant—formerly title XX. These funds were to be used specifically to assist day care centers in training personnel and families to recognize the problem and take immediate action to correct it.

The President's budget for fiscal year 1986 fails to include funding for continuation of these training activities. If we are to begin to attack this problem headon, then we should continue to insist upon a Federal role in this area—one which includes not only funds, but also which includes technical support and guidance.

Mr. Speaker, child abuse continues to be considered the ultimate betrayal. We must be vigorous in our efforts to confront and combat this problem—this includes support for programs that assist communities in this area. Last year's reauthorization of the Child Abuse Prevention and Treatment Act was a reaffirmation of congressional support for continuation of this most vital of social service programs. During this month—Congress can provide the ultimate recognition for this issue by rejecting any and all proposals that seek to reduce funding for child abuse prevention and treatment activities.●

THE NEED FOR A NATIONAL RETIREMENT INCOME POLICY

HON. ROD CHANDLER

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1985

● Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. Speaker, during March the Subcommittee on Labor-Management Relations of the House Education and Labor Committee held hearings on whether there was a need for a national retirement income policy to encompass Social Security and voluntary employer-provided economic security programs.

The consensus of the witnesses at that hearing was that there was indeed such a need. In many issue areas that come to the attention of Congress, reaching a national consensus is quite difficult. With regard to employee benefits—sometimes referred to as flexible benefits—there appears to be a clear consensus that these economic security providing programs are an essential element of national policy. That consensus is set forth effectively in the article that follows—"Forging Employee Benefits Consensus," which appeared in the National Underwriter on April 13, 1985.

The article was prepared by Dallas Salisbury, who is president of the Employee Benefit Research Institute, a nonprofit public policy research organization, that has gained an international reputation for detailed and objective research on economic security programs.

[From the National Underwriter, Apr. 13, 1985]

FORGING EMPLOYEE BENEFITS CONSENSUS

(By Dallas Salisbury)

Why do we have employee benefits?

Concern for the economic security of workers and their dependents motivated the government to encourage the development of employee benefit programs, both public and private and voluntary and mandatory.

Recent surveys indicate that employee benefit programs continue to be provided by employers out of concern for the economic security of employees; a desire for good employee relations; the need to retire workers; and the competitive pressure of other employees having the programs.

For employees, economic security and tax effectiveness are primary concerns: Tax is not paid until an economic benefit is actually received.

Employee benefits, as distinguished from fringe benefits, have these implicit characteristics:

1. They provide for the basic social and physical well-being and financial security of working men and women and their families.

2. They have the potential to provide widespread benefits on a nondiscriminatory basis to large numbers of people at all economic levels.

3. They are sufficiently important that government programs have been enacted to provide the protection to some groups. The government programs would have to be expanded to provide for additional groups in the absence of private sector programs.

4. It is more cost-effective to provide them for most groups through tax-preferred private sector programs than through direct governmental expenditures.

Public support for employee benefits and the implicit national economic security policy they represent is strong. Surveys taken in late 1984 by Roper asked chief executive officers and individuals to express agreement or disagreement with four statements. The first two were commonly used arguments for modifying the tax-favored status of employee benefits. (See below.)

		CEOs	Individuals
First: Employee benefits should be taxed to add to the general revenues of the federal government, thus reducing federal budget deficits.	Agree	20	19
	Disagree	77	75
	Don't Know	3	6
Second: Employee benefits should be taxed to force employees to more carefully use their benefits.	Agree	25	20
	Disagree	72	72
	Don't Know	3	8

WIDE SUPPORT FOR EMPLOYEE BENEFITS

These responses indicate that executives and those who work for them believe that deficits and cost containment are not sufficient reasons to change the tax treatment of employee benefits and that these incentives for economic security should be maintained.

Responses to the next two statements indicate why they favor the present system of employee benefit economic security programs.

		CEOs	Individuals
First: Employee benefits should retain their tax-favored status to provide employees with additional economic security and to contribute to their well being.	Agree	81	85
	Disagree	17	11
	Don't Know	2	4
Second: Employee benefits should retain their tax-favored status to encourage employers to provide certain benefits for their employees that otherwise would come from public monies.	Agree	78	81
	Disagree	21	13

The public believes that employee benefits help their economic security in areas where they would otherwise demand government programs and therefore have to pay for them with higher tax payments. The complementary nature of Social Security and employer-sponsored retirement programs and Medicare, Medicaid, and employer-provided health insurance support this public sentiment.

The public does, however, support tax reform, and attitudes have developed regarding specific approaches that would affect employee benefits. CEOs favor a modified flat tax to the current system by a margin of 58 percent to 31 percent; while individuals favor it by 44 percent to 37 percent.

Yet, support for tax reform may fall apart when individuals focus on the details. For example, Roper found that 58 percent of CEOs opposes a health tax cap; Pen & Schoen found that 77 percent of voters oppose it. This aspect of public opinion regarding tax reform and employee benefits may not yet have been closely focused upon by advocates of reform.

Have incentives in the law been effective?

TAX INCENTIVES

The tax incentives now in the law have made a difference. And, as might be expected, the most widespread employee benefit programs are those that have been encouraged by the tax code for the longest period of time. These programs:

Provide protection against the loss of income or unexpected expenses in the event of illness;

Loss of income in the event of retirement or disability;

And the loss of support by dependents in the event of death.

DATA PRESENTED

Chart I [not reproduced in RECORD] presents data from the Bureau of Labor Statistics on the extent of coverage by these programs among those employed by firms with more than 250 employees. The data indicate that these programs are very widespread. The same is true for the population as a whole, with over 162 million individuals benefiting economically from employee benefits. The Roper surveys found that 98 percent of those surveyed had health insurance; 71 percent of firms and 63 percent of individuals had pensions; 99 percent of firms and 73 percent of individuals had life insurance; and 85 percent of firms and 61 percent of individuals had disability insurance. Forty-one percent of firms had thrift savings plans; 33 percent of firms had 401(k) plans; and 16 percent had reimbursement accounts.

The surveys indicate that these employee benefits are important to employees and employers alike. Ninety-three percent rate health insurance as very important; 84 percent rate the pension plan as very important; 72 percent rated life and diability protection as very important. Significantly, 61 percent said that it would be very difficult to afford the purchase of health insurance if it were not provided by the employer.

What purposes do employers view as most important?

Employee benefits are distinguishable in terms of purposes, as proposals for tax reform indicate. Recent surveys provide evidence that employers share many of the same "purposes" as the advocates of tax change, but they see greater justification for a broader range of benefits than do the "reformers."

Employers were asked by Roper to identify why they sponsor employer benefit programs. Table 1 distinguishes between "very important" and "moderately important" reasons.

TABLE 1.—REASONS FOR SPONSORING EMPLOYEE BENEFIT PLANS

Reason for benefits	Very important	Moderately important	Total
Employee relations	85	14	99
Economic security	75	22	97
Competitive pressure	68	29	97
Company tax deduction	64	21	85
Employee tax preference	51	33	84
Productivity enhancement	30	47	77

DIFFERENT RESULTS

Mercer-Meidinger got slightly different results when it asked CEOs to rank the reasons for employee benefit plan sponsorship. The Mercer-Meidinger CEOs ranked competitive pressure first, economic security second, employee relations third, employee tax preferences fourth, productivity enhancement fifth and the company tax deduction last.

Roper then asked CEOs to choose among "primary considerations for Congress." They responded: First, consider the economic security value to employees of the benefit. Second, consider the effect on the containment of escalating health-care costs. Third, consider the consequences for the continued growth of the private pension system. Fourth, consider federal deficit reduction. Fifth, consider employee access to quality health services. Sixth, consider support for the growing number of retired workers. Seventh, consider employee flexibility in selecting benefits. Mercer-Meidinger asked the same question and obtained the same results.

CLEAR SPLIT

Yet, employer opinion is clearly split regarding what tax preferences should be emphasized if the law is to be changed. When Roper asked what employers would prefer if retirement tax incentives were to be reduced, 36 percent said defined benefit plans should be favored. Four percent said they should be treated equally, and 23 percent didn't know. When the issue turned to employer plans versus IRAs, 47 percent said pension plans should be favored, but 39 percent said preference should be given to IRAs.

Employer preferences, in sum, depend very much on the option provided. Mercer-Meidinger asked CEOs "if they would favor or oppose an overall cap on benefit plan contributions." Twenty-two percent favored such a cap: 70 percent opposed it: and 8 percent didn't know. Both current law and tax reform proposals present overall caps for retirement and capital accumulation programs. But benefit by benefit caps are being proposed for health, welfare and other employee benefits. Mercer-Meidinger found that were a tax cap going to happen, 62 percent would prefer a flat dollar cap indexed to inflation; 19 percent a flat $ cap; 11 percent a cap adjusted to reflect geographic location; and 7.5 percent a cap adjusted to reflect age.

Employers believe that economic security and good employee relations justify tax incentives for employee benefits. The vast majority would prefer no change in employee benefit tax incentives, but they have clear views of what should be done if something must be done.

There is a national consensus for programs that provide economic security and protection against economic risks. There is also a national consensus for tax incentives to encourage employer provision of these employee benefit programs. The challenge is to clearly articulate how various programs fit into the economic security system and why it is vital that government, employers and individuals each have a role in making the system work.●

SENATE COMMITTEE MEETINGS

Title IV of Senate Resolution 4, agreed to by the Senate on February 4, 1977, calls for establishment of a system for a computerized schedule of all meetings and hearings of Senate committees, subcommittees, joint committees, and committees of conference. This title requires all such committees to notify the Office of the Senate Daily Digest—designated by the Rules Committee—of the time, place, and purpose of the meetings, when scheduled, and any cancellations or changes in the meetings as they occur.

As an additional procedure along with the computerization of this information, the Office of the Senate Daily Digest will prepare this information for printing in the Extensions of Remarks section of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on Monday and Wednesday of each week.

Any changes in committee scheduling will be indicated by placement of an asterisk to the left of the name of the unit conducting such meetings.

Meetings scheduled for Thursday, April 25, 1985, may be found in the Daily Digest of today's RECORD.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Thursday, April 25, 1985

The House met at 11 a.m.

Rev. Cecil Hazen, pastor, Pine Forest United Methodist Church, Dublin, GA, offered the following prayer:

Our Eternal Father, historic reminders of America's devoted patriots are all about us. Their lives of courage and commitment inspire us to continue the cause of freedom with vigor.

We are truly grateful for the freedom to govern ourselves. These distinguished Members of the House undertake this privilege seeking Your wisdom and counsel.

Grant them conviction born of courage and compassion, truth free of trivia, and consciences sensitive to their constituents and Creator. Through their daily labors and sacrifices may our Nation continue as the "land of the free and the home of the brave."

May their accomplishments become a complementary part of what You are doing in all nations to bring peace and freedom to this Earth. In His name. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to clause 1, rule I, I demand a vote on agreeing to the Speaker's approval of the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the Chair's approval of the Journal.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FRENZEL there were—yeas 13, nays 62.)

Mr. VOLKMER. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 216, nays 177, not voting 40, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

REV. CECIL HAZEN

(Mr. ROWLAND of Georgia asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. ROWLAND of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, it was in 1954 that a young man came out of the great State of Pennsylvania to south Georgia. There his heart was captured by a young lady.

Mr. Speaker, Cecil Hazen attended the Emory University School of Theology, and Asbury College. He has done numerous ministries in the State of Georgia, in middle Georgia, and in south Georgia.

When you listen to Cecil Hazen he does not speak with the accent of a southerner. He does not sound like a southerner, but he is a southerner at heart. Above all of that, he is a great and dedicated and patriotic American.

Mr. Speaker, it is a real pleasure to have had my pastor here this morning to give the opening prayer.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute for the purpose of inquiring of the majority leader the program for the balance of this day and into next week.

The SPEAKER. Without objection.

There was no objection.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, if the distinguished minority leader will yield, the program for today is quite simply to adopt the rule and conduct the general debate on the State Department authorization bill.

We hope that will come now; it is an open rule, not a controversial rule, and we would like to hope that it would be adopted by a voice vote. If it is not adopted by a voice vote, it will be adopted, we hope, by a recorded vote, and then we will get into the general debate on that bill.

That concludes the legislative business for this week.

Mr. MICHEL. Might I interrupt the majority leader to inquire if we would proceed to read the bill until, or just simply conclude general debate, or would they begin to read the bill until there might be a rollcall or a controversial amendment that would have to be voted on.

Mr. WRIGHT. It is our hope and expectation, and to the degree that the gentleman would cooperate in that expectation, probably a reality, that there would be no further votes today.

The rule, as usually, provides that the bill shall be considered as read and open to amendment at any point, or they might—they will not get into the amending process today in any event. That is not the plan.

The plan would be that that would go over until Tuesday next. The plan is that on Monday next we meet at noon and have two suspensions. One amending the Panama Canal Act of 1979 and the other, accepting a statue of Jeannette Rankin, the Congresswoman from Montana who twice served in this body.

On Tuesday we would hope to meet at noon and we have no suspensions scheduled. I have, however, along with the Speaker, engaged in a colloquy of which I am sure the distinguished minority leader is aware, with the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. FRENZEL] in which we have agreed that someone from your side of the aisle would be recognized to make a preferential motion on Tuesday, the intent of such motion as I understand it, would be to vacate the proceedings in the matter concerning the recount in Indiana's Eighth Congressional District and to call for another election there.

That motion would be, of course, a preferential motion, and as I understand it the plan, and I want to express my appreciation for your having divulged to the leadership your intent to bring it at that time will be entertained.

If that is rejected, it would be our purpose then, after having dealt with the State Department and related agencies authorization bill and concluded it on Tuesday, on Wednesday then to take up the resolution from the House Administration Committee to seat the Representative from the Eighth District of Indiana.

Following that, we would go to the Foreign Assistance Act authorization. Meet at noon on Wednesday and at 11 o'clock on the balance of the week, and those are the things we have scheduled for next week, the things we anticipate; unless other business intrudes meanwhile of which we are unaware.

Mr. FRENZEL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHEL. Yes, I would be happy to yield.

Mr. FRENZEL. I would think with the announcement of that schedule for next week which calls for one vote on Tuesday on a resolution which would declare Indiana's Eighth District congressional seat vacant and a vote on Wednesday on a motion from the House Administration Committee calling for the seating of one of the candidates, it would not be necessary in the absence of some unusual substantive disagreement to have a vote on the rule today.

Is that the gentleman's understanding?

Mr. MICHEL. It is my understanding it is a noncontroversial rule.

Mr. FRENZEL. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. MICHEL. If I might inquire further of the majority leader, I have been asked on the suspensions Monday, would Members be advised to be here for recorded votes on those suspensions, or would they be——

Mr. WRIGHT. Well, we initially had suggested that Members should be here on Monday in order to be recorded on those votes.

Let me just say quite frankly, as to my friend the minority leader, that our purpose in asking Members to be present on those votes was to alert Members to the necessity to be here in the Chamber on that day in order that they might avoid being embarrassed by an absence, when an unexpected motion from the gentleman's side of the aisle might confront them.

Now, if the gentleman is prepared to give us assurances at this time that there will be no unexpected motions of that kind requiring votes, we could enter into a gentleman's agreement, I think, which Members on both sides might appreciate; to the effect that votes on those two suspensions might be postponed until Tuesday and taken on Tuesday. If we could have that kind of an assurance.

Mr. MICHEL. I am not altogether sure that the gentleman is prepared to give them that kind of assurance at this juncture, and would probably defer on that.

Mr. WRIGHT. In that event, I think Members all would be well-advised to plan to be present on Monday, and we will plan then to have votes on the two suspensions after the debate of the two.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would say, under the prerogatives of the Chair, to the leader of the Republican Party, Mr. MICHEL:

Mr. MICHEL, under the prerogatives of the Speaker, I would say that the two matters that would be on the floor, the two suspensions, under the prerogative of the Speaker, the vote will come on them on Tuesday.

That does not mean that there cannot be other rollcalls; for example, the approval of the Journal or something of that nature.

So in view of the fact that, Mr. Majority Leader, and since there has been general discussion of the general agreement on what the schedule will be, then the whip notice will be changed to say the votes on Monday on the suspensions will take place on Tuesday.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I trust the Speaker understood the response of the minority leader the same way I understood it; to the effect that he cannot give assurances that there will be no unexpected votes called for on Monday.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that, but on those two particular votes, the Chair would not anticipate after the agreement that has been made that there would be anything of any serious nature to come up, but of course Members can always call for a vote at the start of the day, but things are always subject to change without notice in a legislative body; you cannot tell the judgment of people and what they will do.

□ 1150

But that is the way it appears at this particular time, that there would be no serious rollcall if the gentleman had business back in his home area.

Mr. WRIGHT. In that case, Mr. Speaker, the plan would be——

The SPEAKER. Two suspensions.

Mr. WRIGHT. Debate the suspensions on Monday, vote on them on Tuesday.

The SPEAKER. Right.

Mr. WRIGHT. But Members need be advised that there might be some other vote on Monday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct.

May I say, after agreement with the Republican leadership, the motion pictures that were taken of the election task force hearing that took place for several hours, will be shown on in-house television on Monday of next week.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY, APRIL 29, 1985

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet at noon on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

REQUEST TO DISPENSE WITH CALENDAR WEDNESDAY BUSINESS ON WEDNESDAY NEXT

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the business in order under the Calendar Wednesday rule be dispensed with on Wednesday next.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

HOUR OF MEETING ON WEDNESDAY NEXT

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns on Tuesday it adjourn to meet at noon on Wednesday next.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Ms. FIEDLER. Mr. Speaker, I have a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. Speaker, I was wondering if the Chair could tell me at what time the Journal vote began that was just cast.

The SPEAKER. It is the information of the Chair that the vote began at 11:05 and was completed about 11:35.

Ms. FIEDLER. I thank the Chair.

A DAY OF VINDICATION

(Mr. MITCHELL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York [Mr. BIAGGI] was gracious enough to let me precede him on the 1-minute, because this is a thrilling, thrilling day for me. Indeed, this is a day of vindication for me. I have always been an activist. And to see the Republican Party begin to follow the activist techniques of H. Rap Brown and Stokely Carmichael and Eldridge Cleaver is really magnificent. I was delighted to see you on the Capitol steps singing "We Shall Overcome." Of course, you did not know the words. And I would suggest that by the time you go to your next NAACP meeting in your districts, be sure to know the words to "We Shall Overcome."

This is a day of vindication for me to see the staid, old Republican Party begin to be true activists. That is magnificent.

Now, I have a few words of caution for you: The next time you use some activist techniques, be sure to raise the clenched fist in utter defiance, as was done in the past. Also, I should warn you that if you are an activist you should be prepared to go to jail, and I hope some of you will go to jail.

Finally, my newly found activist friends, I hope you will pursue this activism in your districts where racism and sexism abound.

RETALIATION FOR MURDER OF MAJ. ARTHUR NICHOLSON

(Mr. BROOMFIELD asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, news reports today indicate that the administration may expel a Soviet diplomat in retaliation for the murder of U.S. Army Maj. Arthur Nicholson.

I am all for it, and I would like to recommend that Soviet Ambassador Dobrynin be the one we send packing.

It may seem harsh, but if we are going to adopt a get-tough policy, we might as well start at the top.

I know the Ambassador has many friends in Washington who will miss him. But this is serious business.

Let's let the Soviets know once and for all that if they continue to murder our finest military men and shoot down civilian airliners, it's going to cost them more than an embassy clerk.

No one wants to go overboard. But this is the least we can do for the family of Major Nicholson and the honor and prestige of our great country.

A HIGHER STANDARD

(Mr. BIAGGI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, yesterday in New York City two police officers were arrested and another suspended over allegations that they tortured suspects under their control with devices such as electric shock guns. I commend the swiftness of the response of both Mayor Koch and the Queens district attorney in this matter.

As a police officer for 23 years in New York City and having been associated with law enforcement most of my adult life, it grieves me deeply each and every time there are allegations involving criminal misconduct against police officers. I am especially appalled when they involve brutality against civilians, which does so much to shatter the confidence and relations between the police and the community.

Mr. Speaker, there is a higher standard that police officers must adhere to both in terms of enforcing and upholding the law. There simply can be no compromising on these standards. When there is wrongdoing, it must be dealt with swiftly and with certainty. However, cases of criminal misconduct against individuals should not serve as an indictment against all of law enforcement. That would be wrong, for there are countless thousands of dedicated people in law enforcement who risk their lives on a daily basis to protect the people. They are more typical of our law enforcement personnel.

WHAT KIND OF FOOLS ARE WE?

(Mr. McCOLLUM asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. McCOLLUM. Mr. Speaker, yesterday the U.S. House of Representatives cast a tragic vote. Yesterday the House endorsed unilateral disarmament in the face of Communist aggression in Central America. By voting yesterday to deny any aid to the Contra freedom fighters against the Communist Sandinistas in Nicaragua, we eliminated the one weapon that was realistic that we had to contain the Communist expansionist intentions of the Sandinista Nicaraguans.

I submit to you that it is interesting to note that today, by our intelligence accounts, there are about 8,000 Cubans in some advisory capacity inside Nicaragua, and our intelligence says that about 2,000 or more are there in a military advisory capacity. As a gesture to show what kind of wonderful response we will get to this unilateral disarmament we voted yesterday, the leadership of the Sandinista Communists declared today that they are going to send home, on May 2, 100 of those 8,000 Cuban advisers.

What kind of fools are we?

REPRESENTATIVE LEON PANETTA COMMENDED FOR WORK ON TASK FORCE

(Mr. VOLKMER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. VOLKMER. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I rise on this occasion to commend our colleague, the gentleman from California, LEON PANETTA, for the outstanding work that he did heading up the task force on the question of the election in the Eighth District of Indiana.

I think it takes a great deal of courage for anybody to be able to do the work that LEON did in a nonpartisan, objective manner. And I believe that anyone reading the report from the House Administration Committee comes to the same conclusion that I have, that it was a very hard job but one done in a very objective manner.

I would like to comment from that report: No one regrets more deeply than does this committee the fact that the residents of the Eighth District were not more decisive in their choice of a Representative. Because of the closeness of the election, it has been suggested that a special election should be called. But for this House to reject the results of last November's election would be to reject the citizens who voted and the individual they elected. In our democracy, the person with the majority of the votes wins, regardless how slim that majority might be. If four votes is not enough, how many would be? Five or eight or ten? Or would it have to be 25, 38, or 50? This committee accepts the general principle that "nothing short of an impossibility of ascertaining for whom the majority of votes were given ought to vacate an election." We are not faced with that impossibility. We have a vote tally produced by the GAO under committee rules and direction, which is a valid tally, a fair, accurate, and complete tally.

A DISTINCTION WITHOUT A DIFFERENCE

(Mr. THOMAS of California asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. THOMAS of California. Mr. Speaker, pity the poor chairman of the Task Force on Indiana's Eighth District. Mr. PANETTA has been clinging to a distinction without a difference. He said, "Count some ballots, but not all the ballots." The reason? Out of the 6 months that the county clerk held the ballots, some of them made a 1-day trip to the precinct on election day.

Does Mr. PANETTA know that courthouses are precincts? One day out of six months; down the stairs, up the stairs. Count some, but do not count others. The recount director said the security was the same. Why did Mr. PANETTA count some and not others? He cites Indiana law. That is right. After the majority leader asked for and by a straight partisan vote, this House agreed to refuse to honor Indiana law, and seat the certified candidate. How sad.

The Democrat leadership's justification for overturning Indiana law, ignoring its citizens' choices, and changing the outcome of the election is based upon a distinction without a difference. Justified by, yup, you guessed it, Indiana law.

DECKARD CRITICIZES REPUBLICAN CLAIMS OF DEMOCRATS TRYING TO "STEAL" SEAT

(Mr. ALEXANDER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, former GOP Congressman Joel Deckard, saying his political bridges have been burned behind him, is critical of Republican cries that Democrats are attempting to steal the Eighth Congressional District seat.

It seems to me everything the recount commission has done has been open to the scrutiny of the public. I'd like to know how they (Democrats) are stealing it under those circumstances.

Republicans have been critical of the House's recount of the votes from the November 6 election for Democrat Frank McCloskey and Republican Rick McIntyre. They have accused the House of ignoring State laws and creating a process to guarantee a Democratic victory.

I recognize the problem of Indiana state law. That is a tough call to make, but this is a Federal election and up to this point there have been no changes. I don't believe thousands of votes should go uncounted.

More than 5,000 votes were disallowed in the county recounts of Eighth District votes because ballots did not meet requirements of the state laws.

I believe that many people, including myself, are sick to death with some of their comments. The people handling this recount cannot do anything without somone in the Republican Party crying "thief" at every turn.

Despite how the final ballots are counted—one or two votes either way—I believe a special election is the only way to resolve it.

THE DEMOCRATS HAVE ONLY BEEN ABLE TO CONSOLIDATE ON ONE ISSUE

(Mr. FRENZEL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, we are beginning to hear the "Great Coverup for the Great Election Robbery of 1985." Yes, Congressman-elect McIntyre won the election; he was certified; recertified in a recount; and only after the House Democrats were able to dispense with Indiana law, invent rules of their own, count until they got a few votes ahead, and then throw out uncounted votes, were they able to declare McCloskey the possessor of more votes than McIntyre.

It is of great interest to me that the Democrat Party, one of our great parties in our two-party system, which is searching for its soul, which cannot agree on any issues, which could not pass a Nicaraguan bill yesterday, has been able to consolidate only on one issue in this whole year, and that is to steal an election from a duly elected Congressman.

WE SHALL PAY—AND PAY—FOR IT LATER

(Mr. TAUZIN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. TAUZIN. Mr. Speaker, some headlines are trumpeting the story that Congress has reputated the policy of support for the Contras in Nicaragua. I challenge that interpretation of yesterday's House activities.

While we failed to approve the administration's proposal, and failed to finally endorse any proposal to amend the administration's policy, we are yet to define a majority-approved congressional policy position on Nicaragua.

If anything, we have delayed a resolution of the issue, and we have figuratively tossed the ball, for a time, into the Sandinistas court.

Those who have argued to give the Sandinistas another chance to change—to negotiate a peaceful return to democracy and pluralism for Nicaragua—to terminate their alliance with every international terrorist organization known to man; those who believe that this new Communist regime in the mainland Americas will let its democratic neighbors alone—will soon know the truth.

And the truth, I am afraid, will not change anymore than those Marxist Sandinistas will change.

The truth is that we have witnessed the growth of an awful cancer—another extension of Soviet Communist colonialism into our back yard. And we will, for now, permit that cancer to grow and to spread, before we summon the will to effectively deal with it. To coin the old Fram oil filter commercial. We have in effect failed to pay for our filter today, and we shall pay—and pay—for it later.

HOW WAS IT FAIR?

(Mr. DEWINE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. DEWINE. Mr. Speaker, someone once observed that "the one pervading evil of democracy is the tyranny of the majority, or rather of that party, not always the majority, that succeeds, by force or fraud, in carrying elections."

Today, the leadership of this body stands ready to carry, by their blatant use of power, the Eighth District of Indiana congressional election. They call this fairness, but their actions belie the words. How was it fair to leave the seat vacant for 3½ months? How was it fair to deny representation to the people of Indiana's Eighth District as long as the Republican was ahead? How was it fair to make up the rules for recounting ballots on party lines?

When the State of Indiana counted the ballots, Rick McIntyre won. It is the responsibility of the Indiana secretary of state to certify the election outcome. He did so.

Now the leadership of this body and those on the other side of the aisle—hardly a disinterested group—have in a creative recount found their candidate the winner.

I guess the only thing I'm surprised at is that they only gave their candidate a four-vote victory.

LET US RESPECT THE ORDERLY PROCESS OF THIS INSTITUTION

(Mr. DURBIN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. DURBIN. Mr. Speaker, now that the House Administration Committee report has been published, it is clear that Frank McCloskey won the congressional race in the Eighth Congressional District of Indiana by four votes: the closest congressional contest in this century.

It is becoming increasingly clear that my Republican colleagues are disappointed with this outcome and disappointed with the fact that they have lost this contest. But it is interesting to note the tactics and rhetoric of my Republican colleagues in response to this outcome. Some Republican Members have threatened civil disobedience, guerrilla tactics, moving to expel one of our colleagues who served on the recount task force, physically restraining Members of Congress from voting, disrupting the orderly process of the House, and in the press, one Republican spokesman said that they may go so far as to chain themselves to this podium.

Otherwise honorable Members of the minority party have allowed their rhetoric to descend to the point where they have accused Democratic Members of being thieves, thugs, and slime. This display has strengthened the resolve of this Member and many of my fellow Democrats to follow the orderly process of this institution, to respect the history of this body, and not to bend to these shameful threats.

When the proud and distinguished history of the Republican Party is written, my colleagues on the other side of the aisle can be assured that these sorry statements and threats will not be included.

PULLING THE RUG OF DEMOCRACY OUT OF INDIANA

(Mr. SHAW asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SHAW. Mr. Speaker, 24 years ago this country pulled the rug out from under some valiant freedom fighters at the Bay of Pigs in Cuba. Last night this House pulled the rug out from under some valiant freedom fighters in Nicaragua.

We have been told next week that the House Administration Committee is going to attempt to pull the rug of democracy out from under the people of the Eighth Congressional District of Indiana.

I would hope before any of my colleagues, particularly on the majority side, cast their vote next week on that important issue that you ask yourself one question: Have you taken democracy out of the Democrat Party?

MINORITY AND MAJORITY SHOULD WORK TOGETHER

(Mr. COLEMAN of Texas asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. COLEMAN of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I think it is important to note that it was not the Democrats who defeated the bill last night alone. In fact, more Republicans, more Republicans percentagewise in this House, voted against sending a bill to the conference committee with the other body.

So when I hear Members state that, like the Eighth District of Indiana, it is the Democrats' fault, I only would say to the gentleman from Minnesota and those who have spoken with him this morning that all of us certainly bear a responsibility in trying to deal with that most serious problem in Central America. It is time now for all of us to understand that it is not only one country, it is the entire hemisphere that is at stake.

We should all work together in a bipartisan fashion in order to see to it that we address the true issue, the problem of Central and South America, as well as our neighbor to the south, Mexico, and their problems in a way that will be constructive and in our best interest.

I would hope that the minority party, along with the majority party, would begin to work together, beginning today, rather than showing us a display of what the rules call dilatory tactics.

"DO SVIDANIYA," SENOR ORTEGA

(Mr. SOLOMON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Speaker, in Russia the term "Do svidaniya" means "Have a good trip," so I say "Do svidaniya, Senor Ortega. Your trip to Moscow today could not have been better timed. In fact, I predict your trip will be only the first in a series of celebrations by America's enemies over yesterday's decision by this House to, in my opinion, "abandon the cause of freedom in Central America."

The Soviets love to speak about the correlation of forces in international affairs. But I'm more impressed by the correlation of dates. This week, we have marked the 10th anniversary of our abandonment of Vietnam by setting the stage for another anniversary 10 years from now—our abandonment of Central America.

Now I know a lot of good Americans who oppose aid to the Contras, those who seem to listen to Mr. Ortega rather than our own President, thought that Mr. Ortega would respond by getting up early and building all those schools and hospitals he says Ronald Reagan has stopped him from building.

But I guess the man feels he's entitled to a vacation. Maybe a shopping spree for Soviet arms. And why not? For the Communists in Nicaragua, it's clear sailing from here on out, unless, of course, this House reverses the action it took last night.

DEFINITION TIME

(Mr. JACOBS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Speaker, it is definition time. The word is "War Wimp," noun, one who is all too willing to send others to war but never gets around to going to war himself.

The second term is "War Wimp Party," noun, singular, group of War Wimps.

Mr. Speaker, I am happy to report that a majority of my friends on the Republican side are not wearing the lapel buttons displayed by others which say, "Thou shalt not steal," which is meant to suggest criminality on the part of honorable Members of this body. Our Lord God gave us Ten Commandments, and another of those commandments is, "Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor."

THOU SHALT NOT STEAL

(Mrs. BENTLEY asked and was given permission to address the house for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. BENTLEY. Mr. Speaker, I am wearing one of the green buttons as are many others in this room and it does read, "Thou shalt not steal."

That admonition, you might remember, Mr. Speaker, is one of the Ten Commandments, which most of us were taught to obey from our earliest years. We obeyed because it was the will of God.

We now face a crisis in this House because the majority is about to repeal at least one of these Commandments, the one on the button. That majority has cleared the way for stealing the congressional seat in the Eighth Congressional District of Indiana.

As a freshman, I couldn't believe my ears on the day that the task force was appointed. One of the most temperate, well-respected Members of this body, the Honorable BILL FRENZEL, of Minnesota stated that the appointment signaled that "They are going to steal the seat."

It is now clear that he was right and my illusions about fair play were wrong.

Now that the theft is almost complete, the majority has committed this body to the new Commandment that might makes right.

The rest of us will continue to adhere to the old Commandments. Those still include God's prohibition "Thou shalt not steal."

LET'S GUARD THE TREASURY

(Mrs. SCHROEDER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Speaker, there is an awful lot of stealing going on from the Treasury and I think we need to talk about that. If you look at the morning paper, there is a mountain of documents that have come out about General Dynamics and many other of our military contractors who have really been out-and-out looting and raiding the taxpayers.

I think this is what we ought to act on if we want to talk about stealing because this stealing is right out of the taxpayers' pockets. If you noticed, in the House hearings held yesterday the auditors said they are having a terrible time getting the Department of Justice to prosecute or to act on the cases of fraud and waste they have.

It is time this body gets serious about real stealing, stealing of the taxpayers' money. I also find in U.S. News & World Report this week further evidence of it, that the chairman of the board of General Dynamics gave himself a 110 percent raise last year. I want to assure you he was not at the poverty line or anywhere near it before his raise.

The people making money out of the defense bill are not the guys in uniform or not the people whose lives are on the line, but the people who are really making a monetary killing are the defense contractors, and no one in the administration is doing anything about it. Let us get serious about the business at hand and let us guard the Treasury. Let us really go after stealing.

WHAT HAS HAPPENED TO THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY?

(Mr. HILLIS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. HILLIS. Mr. Speaker, what has happened to the Democratic Party?

Why has the party of Jefferson, Jackson, Roosevelt, and Kennedy—the party which has played such a significant role in the evolution of American liberty—become so morally bankrupt as to deny Rick McIntyre the seat to which he was elected?

Why has the Democratic Party chosen to cut the thread of fair play and political decency which forms the very fabric of the democracy under which we live?

Why have they chosen to use their numbers in this body to impose their will on a half million unrepresented Hoosiers?

And why has the leadership chosen to compromise the working relationship between the majority and minority parties in this House by making the Eighth District of Indiana a test of political macho?

In the end, you may seat your candidate, Mr. Speaker, but you cannot violate both principle and precedent without a price.

There may be no antidote to counter the poison which now stands as barrier between Republicans and Democrats and the work they need to accomplish in this Congress.

My last question, Mr. Speaker: Is all this really worth it?

CENTRAL AMERICA: DOSE OF REALITY—NO. 4

(Mr. GONZALEZ asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Speaker, the Reagan administration decided in 1981 to provide covert aid to stimulate a guerrilla campaign against the Government of Nicaragua. This decision was communicated in secret to the House and Senate Intelligence Committees in December of that year. Neither committee thought that the idea was particularly bright, but the Director of the Central Intelligence Agency assured one and all that this would be a small, limited-purpose operation.

The Intelligence Committees did not quite believe the assurances they were given. Accordingly, the committees agreed to allow aid to the so-called Contras, but explicitly limited the use of the funds to interdict arms that the administration claimed were being shipped from Nicaragua to rebels in El Salvador, this being the so-called Boland amendment. The committees also provided that none of the money could be used for the purpose of overthrowing the Government of Nicaragua. This proviso was secret, but President Reagan could have no doubt that the Congress very much opposed the idea of trying to carry out a guerrilla campaign against Nicaragua, for the same language was included in the Defense appropriations resolution for fiscal 1983—by a unanimous vote in the House.

Far from being a small, limited purpose effort, by the time of that December open vote in the House, the CIA had built up a 10,000-man Contra army, based in Honduras. The Contras never found any of the arms that they were supposed to be stopping, and as later events would prove, the operation was hardly one of interdicting arms. It was instead a campaign designed to overthrow the Sandinista government, notwithstanding what the law said. A few months after the adoption of the Boland amendment, the Contras, using CIA support vessels, advice, and materials, were laying mines in the harbors of Nicaragua. This was anything but an effort to interdict arms, and it was an operation of far greater scope than Congress had authorized. The blatant excesses and outright stupidity of the Nicaraguan operations infuriated even the most hawkish of hawks, who found themselves embarrassed and undercut by the violations of clear congressional policy, and the outright violation of the Boland amendment.

This is what the Boland amendment provides, and the language is the same in both the secret CIA authorization of 1982 and the publicly adopted defense title of the continuing resolution adopted later that year:

None of the funds provided in this act may be used by the Central Intelligence Agency or the Department of Defense to furnish military equipment, military training, or advice, or other support for military activities, to any group or individual, not part of a country's armed forces, for the purpose of overthrowing the Government of Nicaragua or provoking a military exchange between Nicaragua and Honduras.

But by that time, the Contra forces had already been built up far beyond what the CIA had said would be done, a force far larger than could be justified for the purposes the Intelligence Committees had authorized, and far larger than what would have been needed for the interdiction operations that CIA Director Casey had said they would be used for. The Reagan administration from the outset deceived the Intelligence Committees, and violated congressional policy, even when that policy had been adopted openly, by a 411–0 vote in the House. It was a reckless, lawless performance, proving that the Intelligence Committees had been right about their belief that the CIA could not be trusted to operate either covertly, with discretion, or cleverness—let alone be kept in reasonable control.

ELKS LODGES IN NORTH CAROLINA COMMENDED FOR PROGRAMS ON DRUG AWARENESS

(Mr. COBLE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. COBLE. Mr. Speaker, today I express thanks to the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks in North Carolina for its contribution in the areas of drug awareness. Its target area is the youth enrolled in the fourth through the ninth grades. The objective is to increase their awareness of the adverse consequences of drug abuse so that they will decide for themselves to avoid drugs.

The program is under the direction of Byron Long, State president; Ernest Bell, national youth chairman; and James Green, State drug awareness chairman, who have taken great steps in not only informing our youth but their parents and teachers as well. The 41 Elks lodges of North Carolina have contributed greatly and are working to combat this crippler of the young. I salute the B.P.O.E. for its assistance in keeping our Nation strong by encouraging our next generation to avoid the use of drugs.

THE DO-NOTHING APPROACH TO CENTRAL AMERICA

(Mr. ROEMER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ROEMER. Mr. Speaker, I was disappointed in our actions of yesterday. First, we passed a genuine attempt on the part of some Members to not quit the region of Central America with the Barnes-Hamilton amendment. It was a pitiful, do-nothing, run-but-not-hide amendment which I could not support, but at least it was an attempt at some middle ground, a hands-on foreign policy.

Next we defeated the Michel amendment, which would have given some limited humanitarian support to the Contras. I supported this approach. It was the minimum action for our country, but it, too, failed. Then the Congress failed to send to conference any bill.

This final failure—and let us not be fooled by comments to the contrary—in my opinion, is the sole responsibility of those Members who gave the Hamilton-Barnes option a majority in the first place. Sadly, this truth has been belatedly revealed to middle-ground Democrats.

The moderate, reasonable, middle-ground Democrats have now discovered that many Democrats want no action in Central America, no military support, no humanitarian support, no support at all.

Mr. Speaker, I ask those good men and women who know we cannot be an ostrich in our foreign policy to join with us who want to do something and formulate a policy better than the President's and surely better than yesterday's do-nothing approach.

EL SALVADOR COMMENDED FOR ITS IMMUNIZATION PROGRAM

(Mr. SMITH of New Jersey asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I took to the well of the House to inform my colleagues of the exceedingly successful mass immunization program organized in El Salvador by President Jose Napoleon Duarte. I observed this great humanitarian effort firsthand over the weekend and feel this body should appropriately congratulate President Duarte and those involved.

The campaign was a model of good planning, effective management, and interagency cooperation. Key to the vaccine campaign's success was the participation by U.S. Agency for International Development, UNICEF, PAHO, and several other agencies and organizations. I am very proud of our Government's contribution to this humanitarian effort. Very proud. It underscores our commitment to the well-being and safety of the people of El Salvador, especially her children.

Mr. Speaker, it is extremely important that we recognize the direct leadership role President Duarte played in the immunization program. It is estimated that approximately 300,000 Salvadoran children were immunized and thereby protected from painful debilitating and even fatal diseases such as whooping cough, diphtheria, tetanus, measles, and polio. Tens of thousands more will be vaccinated in a followup effort. It is clear, though, that without President Duarte's leadership, there would not have been an immunization campaign in El Salvador.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the major obstacle to the immunization of all the world's children is not expense—it is relatively inexpensive—nor is it lack of interest on the part of volunteers and medical staff. Indeed, the El Salvador program benefited from more than 20 international and local organizations as well as more than 18,000 Salvadoran volunteers and medical staff.

Instead, Mr. Speaker, the chief problem lies in the lack of leadership at the highest echelons of governments. With proper leadership, like in El Salvador, millions of children could be saved. It is so sad and regrettable, Mr. Speaker, that only 20 percent of the world's families are aware of and taking advantage of the new low-cost immunization mechanisms which could protect their children. As a result, more than 5 million children die and a further 5 million more are mentally and physically disabled each year from these easily preventable diseases.

Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, President Duarte provided an inspiring example to the rest of the developing world, as to how to close the gap between available immunization services and children actually immunized in a country. In El Salvador, approximately 900,000 children were in need of vaccines to protect them from these chronic diseases, and now many are protected. Despite the war-torn status of his country, President Duarte had the compassion, vision, and commitment to lead a nationwide effort to protect his country's children. We must encourage other leaders in the Third World to emulate the El Salvador program.

Mr. Speaker, I am happy to report to my colleagues that few people in El Salvador were unaware of the national immunization campaign. With President Duarte leading the project, radio stations, churches, banks, health groups, and schools all participated in the promotion, as well as the completion, of the vaccine campaign. By establishing conveniently located vaccination points—over 2,000 in El Salvador—and by coordinating specific dates and times, President Duarte ensured that more parents would be aware of the immunization programs. Thus, thousands of El Salvadoran children were immunized and an overwhelming percentage of children returned to receive all three doses which are needed for certain vaccinations to be effective.

Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that President Duarte's effort in El Salvador will serve as a model for similarly needed programs throughout the developing world. El Salvador is a success story, an inspiration, and an example to be duplicated elsewhere in the developing world. Accordingly, Mr. Speaker, I have introduced a resolution recognizing and applauding President Duarte for his foresight and effective leadership in this program. I am pleased that Mr. FASCELL, the distinguished chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, as well as Mr. BROOMFIELD, the ranking minority of the committee, and Mr. YATRON, chairman of the Subcommittee on Human Rights, and Mr. SOLOMON, ranking minority of that subcommittee as well as several distinguished Members including Mr. KEMP, Mr. HYDE, Mr. WOLF, Mr. MCCOLLUM, Mr. WEBER, and Mr. MCEWEN have joined me as original cosponsors of my resolution.

I urge all my colleagues in the House to join me in supporting this resolution.

BACK TO THE DRAWING BOARD ON CENTRAL AMERICA

(Mr. STAGGERS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. STAGGERS. Mr. Speaker, I was dismayed by the vote last night also, that after 14 hours of debate we failed to produce a measure to address the problems confronting Central America, after 14 hours of debate on military strategy and political consequences, after 14 hours of debate in which the suffering of innocent civilians was grievously documented, and after 14 hours to say no to aid, with a postscript that we have no alternatives.

To my colleagues, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HAMILTON] and the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. BARNES], I would say they had a very good effort, and I supported that effort. There is clearly a need to bring stability and security to the region. Also it is in our power to provide humanitarian aid to solve problems brought about by such things as the polio epidemic that may well spread across Central America.

To those who say Hamilton-Barnes did nothing, I say you are wrong. To those who want no aid to the region, I say you are wrong also.

Mr. Speaker, there was an opportunity to nurture democracy throughout the region, but we have thrown out the baby with the bath water, and it is back to the drawing board.

ORTEGA CELEBRATES VICTORY, SCHEDULES MOSCOW TRIP

(Mr. LIVINGSTON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, the forces against U.S. involvement in Central America were triumphant last night, but I believe they can take little solace in their hollow victory.

The much-touted Barnes-Hamilton alternative to the President's policy failed even to retain a majority of the Members on the Democratic side of the aisle, and the transparency was given to the contention that there was any real majority support to do anything other than frustrate the President in his foreign policy initiatives.

Furthermore, for those who genuinely believe that the United States has been wrong in its involvement in Central America, let me offer you my strained congratulations. You may take great pride in the fact that your efforts were greeted with such enthusiasm by Sandinista Leader Daniel Ortega that he celebrated your victory with an immediate announcement of his intention to travel to Moscow to seek further instructions.

REAGAN URGED NOT TO VISIT BITBURG CEMETERY

(Mr. LEVINE of California asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LEVINE of California. Mr. Speaker, I wish to commend my colleague, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. TORRICELLI] for the amendment that we will soon pass urging the President not to visit the cemetery at Bitburg.

Mr. Speaker, unfortunately, in addition to the very significant moral and philosophical considerations that this visit raises, the judgment of this President and his advisers to visit this site of Nazi graves raises very fundamental questions on the competence of foreign policy conduct in this administration. It provides us with the potential for severe disruptions in our relations with our most trusted and loyal allies in Western Europe. It gives the Soviets the potential for further very significant propaganda gains throughout both Western and Eastern Europe and throughout the globe.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that a cross-section, on a bipartisan basis, of this House will join in sending both a respectful and strong message to the President of the United States urging him to reverse this outrageous decision.

QUESTIONS OF INTEGRITY AND CHARACTER RELATING TO THE CONTESTED INDIANA VOTE

(Mr. SILJANDER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SILJANDER. Mr. Speaker, the Founding Fathers' idea in the Constitution for this austere establishment was an establishment of men and women of integrity and character. In the Eight District of Indiana, unfortunately, that basis of our Founding Fathers has been desecrated.

Is it integrity to create a bipartisan committee with two Democrats and one Republican? Is it integrity to throw out State law? Is it integrity to then turn around and use the State law when it is to your advantage? Is it character and integrity to count unauthorized ballots in Democratic counties and then turn around and not count unauthorized ballots from Republican counties?

Is it really integrity to literally create rules that guarantee your side victory? Is that fair play? And is it real character and integrity, as the Founding Fathers established for this institution, to count literally more votes in a precinct than there are registered voters? Is this the kind of character and integrity embodied in this institution?

Mr. Speaker, I had hoped that we would reanalyze the Eighth District of Indiana on the basis of our integrity and character.

THE TOMMY HEARNS APPROACH TO INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

(Mr. LUNGREN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LUNGREN. Mr. Speaker, I think yesterday's vote in this House was a tragedy, a tragedy for the people of America, a tragedy for the people of Central America and for all of this hemisphere. But I find instructive some of the comments from the Members on the other side who suggested that the approach the President wanted was wrong. They said that would tend to have people gaze upon what the Contras are doing and not focus on what the Sandinistas are doing, that if we can just have people see what the Sandinistas are doing, world opinion will make them change.

I guess we would call that the Tommy Hearns approach to international relations. As Tommy Hearns was sitting there on his back seeing stars, he probably thought in his mind, "I may be knocked out, but, by God, that Marvelous Hagler, his arms sure are tired."

I guess that is all we have got to do. We keep getting knocked out and knocked out and knocked out, and, by God, those Sandinistas are going to fall over from sheer exhaustion in their victories.

BITBURG IS NOT YOUR PLACE, MR. PRESIDENT

(Mr. PORTER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I address these remarks to our President for whom I have the deepest respect and the highest admiration.

Mr. President, do not go to Bitburg Cemetery. As cochairman of the Congressional Human Rights Caucus, I believe I speak for all of our members when I say laying wreaths at Nazi graves would be a terrible debasement of the sacrifices of tens of millions of people you care about deeply:

American combat veterans and war dead—not only in that war, but in all wars to preserve freedom;

Holocaust victims, martyred or living, and their partners in conscience, all of us, committed to keeping that memory alive;

Europeans who fought against and suffered so much at the hands of the Nazi terror. Our current allies. But also, perhaps especially, the Poles, Czechs, Hungarians, Yugoslavs, Ukranians, and, yes, even the Russian people. They would see Bitburg through the eyes of state-controlled television, which will be spliced with visions of the horrors they remember so well. All that we have gained in standing for human freedom will be lost in your unintended embrace of its enemies.

No, Mr. President; Bitburg is not your place. Don't go.

VOTE LAST NIGHT WILL LEAD TO MORE REPRESSION AND SPREAD OF REVOLUTION IN CENTRAL AMERICA

(Mr. BURTON of Indiana asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, this morning on "Good Morning, America" Steve Bell interviewed a Vietnamese young man who in the early seventies demonstrated here in America against the Vietnam war.

After the war, he went back to Vietnam to help in the redistribution of wealth program. He told of some differences he had with the Communist government's policies and how they threw him into jail for 2½ years because of that disagreement.

He said prison is worse now than before, and the use of tiger cages still occurs.

He told of spying by neighbor on neighbor, with the withholding of food being used to control this spying. Those who complain are reported and many go to jail without a trial.

This is the Communist program used in the Soviet Union, Vietnam, Cuba, and Nicaragua.

Our vote last night to do nothing to stop these practices will lead to more repression and a spread of revolution in Central America, just as it did in Southeast Asia. There will then be many people like this Vietnamese young man—from the United States and Central America who will then see the light.

I pray it will not be too late.

THE ARROGANCE OF THE MAJORITY ON EIGHTH DISTRICT OF INDIANA ELECTION

(Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. There seems to be, Mr. Speaker, some genuine confusion on the Democratic side of the aisle. As a Member who is not yet willing to say that the phrase "decent Democrat" is an oxymoron, let me explain to you how deeply the Republicans feel about what we look at as the arrogance of the majority concerning the Eighth District of Indiana.

Look at the case. We do not ask much. We do not ask much. Two probably decent people have gone through very long months, but we believe that there has been a deliberate and conscious effort to take an election, that the people of that Eighth District are not being allowed to choose their representative and that the Democrats indeed are afraid to let democracy work.

It is, and I am reminded of the 1 minute speech by the gentleman from Maryland, it is the party of Lincoln that is activist and involved and some of us who do fight and have fought racism and sexism believe maybe the Democrats should agree that the fight against racism and sexism and for democracy should finally enter the doors of the House.

A COMMENDATION TO 46 COURAGEOUS DEMOCRATS

(Mr. RITTER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. RITTER. Mr. Speaker, Democrats seeking to move their party back into the center, into the mainstream of American political life, received a severe setback in yesterday's vote. That was the vote to deny humanitarian nonlethal assistance to those fighting totalitarianism in America.

I would like to commend those 46 Democrats who had the courage to buck a conservative effort on the part of their leadership to whip their troops into line; from BARNARD to BENNETT to BEVILL to BIAGGI to STRATTON, TALLON, TAUZIN, THOMAS, and WILSON, we saw the real Democratic Party stand up, the Democratic Party of FDR, Truman, Kennedy, Humphrey, and Jackson.

In the weeks ahead there will be time for other more moderate Democrats to reevaluate their position, to reconsider the meaning of deserting freedom fighters right south of our border.

When in doubt, I urge my Democratic colleagues, bet on liberty.

DEMOCRATS HAVE CONTROLLED RECOUNT IN EIGHTH DISTRICT OF INDIANA

(Mr. KINDNESS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. KINDNESS. Mr. Speaker, I know from personal experience and observation that there are at least 70 to 80 of our colleagues on the Democratic side of the aisle who are not thieves, who are not dishonest, who do want to see the right conclusion of all this concern about the Eighth District of Indiana. Other people's observations may go beyond that. I am sure there are more.

Let me say that I am disturbed to hear the repeated misstatements by our colleagues from the other side of the aisle, such as one expressed today that the General Accounting Office conducted this recount in Indiana. That is not true.

The fact comes down to this. The Democratic Party has controlled who does the count. They hired people who happened to otherwise work for the General Accounting Office, but when you get right down to the end of the line, let us sweep away all the chaff. There were a group of ballots there. Someone counted. They were of the same category basically and some were not. You have lost your fairness argument. It is time for a special election.

CAPTURED RECORDS REVEAL COMMUNIST STRATEGY AND TACTICS

(Mr. LAGOMARSINO asked and was given permission to address the house for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and to include extraneous material.)

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, Daniel Ortega is celebrating what happened here yesterday by announcing his decision to go to Moscow to seek additional aid. Some other people who are celebrating are El Salvador's Marxist guerrillas, because they believe the Sandinista success in crushing the Nicaraguan resistance would be decisive in their plans to bring down the Salvadoran Government.

According to documents captured last week by the Salvadoran Army, in a letter addressed to the Sandinista National Directorate date November 24, 1983, the four top Salvadoran guerrilla commanders also expressed support for Managua's diplomatic initiatives because they help President Reagan's opposition in the United States.

The Salvadoran guerrillas hail Sandinista diplomatic efforts because they "gain time to help opposition in the United States and to internationally isolate President Reagan's aggressive plans toward Nicaragua and El Salvador."

No other reason for their support of diplomacy was listed.

The guerrilla commanders dismiss the importance of their negotiating with the Salvadoran Government because "dialog does not play an important role in our diplomatic battles."

Rebel commanders also asked the Sandinista Directorate for "a much higher level of logistical assistance" since "coordination and cooperation" between the Salvadoran guerrillas and the Sandinistas is of the highest priority."

Mr. Speaker, I include the article by Roger Fontaine of the Washington Times, as follows:

CAPTURED RECORDS REVEAL COMMUNIST STRATEGY, TACTICS

(By Roger Fontaine)

El Salvador's Marxist guerrilla leaders believe a Sandinista success in crushing the Nicaraguan resistance would be decisive in their plans to bring down the Salvadoran democratic government, according to documents captured last week.

In a letter addressed to the Sandinista national directorate dated Nov. 24, 1983, the four top Salvadoran guerrilla commanders also expressed support for Managua's diplomatic initiatives because they help President Reagan's opposition in the United States. The letter and other documents seized by the Salvadoran army were obtained by The Washington Times.

Rebel leaders stressed "the internal consolidation of the Sandinista Popular Revolution is the "determining factor for our liberation process."

"At this time, the highest priority for the FSLN [Sandinistas] is to continue and aggravate the wearing away of the enemy forces"—the Nicaragua resistance—"which in turn will allow us to enter that situation with our political and military forces better developed and consolidated, and with a larger capacity to bog down the aggression if it were to happen."

The guerrilla commanders' statement refers to a pledge by the Farabundo Marti National Liberation Front, or FMNL, to respond to the introduction of U.S. combat troops in Central America, according to one State Department official.

The guerrillas hail Sandinista diplomatic efforts because they "gain time to help opposition in the United States and to internationally isolate [President Reagan's] aggressive plan towards Nicaragua and El Salvador."

No other reason for their support of diplomacy was listed.

The guerrilla commanders dismiss the importance of their negotiating with the Salvadoran government because "dialogue does not play an important role in our diplomatic battles."

Important diplomatic "battles" listed in the letter included mustering "international pressure" to stop "U.S. intervention."

Rebel commanders also asked the Sandinista directorate for "a much higher level of logistical assistance" since "coordination and cooperation" between the Salvadoran guerrillas and the Sandinistas "is of the highest priority."

"We believe that present circumstances are favorable to take daring steps in this direction," they added.

The documents, according to State Department officials, constitute the richest haul of material detailing the inside workings of the Salvadoran rebels and their relationship with the Nicaraguan government since the capture of a diary belonging to the chairman of the El Salvadoran Communist party five years ago.

More documents are expected to be released shortly.

They were seized by the Salvadoran army in a raid on a guerrilla base camp last week in El Salvador's San Vicente province in which seven guerrillas were killed and a high-ranking political-military section chief, Nidia Diaz, was captured.

The camp, according to officials, belonged to the Central American Revolutionary Workers' Party (PRTC), one of five military factions that belong to the FMLN guerrilla coalition.

The commanders' letter was in reply to a Sandinista foreign commission report given them for comment. The report outlines Managua's diplomatic strategy.

The closeness of their working relationship, according to State Department officials, is demonstrated in the military commanders' letter.

The FMLN commanders who signed the letter included Shafik Jorge Handal, chairman of the El Salvadoran Communist Party, Joaquin Villalobos, head of the Popular Revolutionary Army, Roberto Roca of the Central American Revolutionary Workers' Party, and Leonel Gonzalez of the Popular Liberation Forces.

The guerrilla leaders, all headquartered in Nicaragua, stated their agreement was the Sandinista foreign affairs commission's report and its conclusions that the U.S. election period was "the appropriate moment to influence the American electorate."

"The Sandinista Popular Revolution and the Salvadoran Revolutionary Movement are the most sensitive points in Central America and they could bog down the present Reagan Administration," the letter said.

The military commanders underlined the importance of defeating "the aggressive policy of Reagan" through "the joint efforts of the Socialist Camp, the National Liberation Movements and all the Progressive Forces . . ."

Officials did not explain why the documents, available since last week, were only distributed Tuesday night during the House debate on funding for the Nicaraguan resistance forces. The rebel camp was captured on April 18.

Salvadoran rebel cooperation and assistance to the Sandinistas shows up in another captured document, the hand-written notes of an undated meeting between FMLN and Sandinista officials in which joint efforts were outlined, including contingency planning.

The minutes state that U.S. "aggression" against Nicaragua was inevitable and to be launched "within a few days." They affirm that the common interest of the Sandinistas and the Salvadoran rebels was the "defense of the Nicaraguan revolution."

According to the minutes, cooperation was more than rhetorical. Officials agreed that an FMLN military unit was to receive one month of intensive military training and then be deployed to a border area closest to Nicaragua.

The minutes disclose that "at the first shots" indicating a U.S. attack on Nicaragua, FMLN propaganda materials and funds are to be shipped from Nicaragua to El Salvador.

The document also indicated that this would be a joint decision of the Sandinistas and the FMLN.

Other captured documents show the Salvadorn rebels are dependent on other Soviet bloc states for training and instruction.

On a page of a captured guerrilla calendar for May 1984 are found names of guerrillas destined for instruction in Bulgaria, the Soviet Union and Vietnam.

Other foreign training was indicated in captured guerrilla personnel files. The cards list names, pseudonyms, sex, civil state, number of children, profession, schooling, military experience and physical problems.

The last line of each card indicates political and military training. In the file cards made available to The Washington Times, five showed instruction in Cuba, and another said simply "a military course in the exterior."

Another captured document—two pages of hand-written excerpts from a FMLN foreign affairs commission political analysis—reveals a preoccupation with the possibility of U.S. combat troops being deployed in the region.

In paragraph 17, the report says if aggression against Nicaragua begins, "the frontiers disappear."

It characterized the Reagan administration as the most aggressive in recent years and stated that its interventionism was aimed at Central America and Grenada.

Although the report is undated, it refers to "our tragic defeat in Grenada"—which one State Department official said indicates the FMLN's "full identification with the Marxists-Leninists in Grenada" and "reaffirms a common thread throughout the documents, which is the importance placed on communication and cooperation with other communist groups."

PARTY LINE VOTE OF TASK FORCE

(Mr. MONSON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MONSON. Mr. Speaker, in thier second hearing, when McCloskey was behind by 12 votes, the task force from House Administration voted to count 10 unnotarized absentee ballots.

In the final hearing, after McCloskey had moved into a three-vote lead, the task force decided on a 2 to 1, party line vote, not to count the other 32 unnotarized absentee ballots.

When the Committee on House Administration met to review the report of its task force, Mr. SHUMWAY, selected by the Democrats to supervise the task force recount, testified that the 32 unnotarized absentee ballots the task force refused to count had been afforded the same level of security as the 10 unnotarized absentee ballots the task force had previously voted to count.

Further questioning brought the following exchange:

Congressman THOMAS. If you agreed to count the first ballots, what would you have done in your professional position with the second set of ballots? Would you have counted them or not counted them?

Mr. SHUMWAY. Based on the security and handling, I guess we would have counted them.

COUNTING THE VOTES IN INDIANA'S EIGHTH CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICT

(Mr. COBEY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. COBEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to repeat what my distinguished colleague from Utah [Mr. MONSON] just mentioned because it bears repeating.

In a second meeting when McCloskey was behind by 12 votes, the task force voted to count 10 unauthorized absentee ballots.

In the final hearing after McCloskey had moved into a three-vote lead, the task force decided on a 2-to-1 party line vote not to count the other 32 unauthorized absentee ballots.

When the Committee on House Administration met to review the report of its task force, Mr. SHUMWAY, selected by the Democrats to supervise the task force recount, testified that the 32 unnotarized absentee ballots the task force refused to count had been afforded the same level of security as the 10 unnotarized absentee ballots the task force had previously voted to count.

Further questioning brought the following exchange:

Congressman THOMAS. If you agreed to count the first ballots, what would you have done in your professional position with the second set of ballots? Would you have counted them or not counted them?

Mr. SHUMWAY. Based on the security and handling, I guess we would have counted them.

THE 5 HOUR AND 45 MINUTE TAPE GAP

(Ms. OAKAR asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, I understand there is a 14-minute tape, paid for by the Republican Congressional Campaign Committee, concerning hearings that the Task Force on Elections had regarding the McCloskey-McIntyre issue.

This 14-minute tape, based on hours and hours, more than 6 hours of one hearing, for example, was spliced and put together in such a way as to misrepresent what really happened. I call that the 5 hour and 45 minute tape gap.

Where have we heard that before? We remember in the Watergate situation there were a number of hours of tapes that were not there, and it created a national scandal.

I urge my friends on the other side of the aisle to take a look at all of the proceedings rather than this spliced 14-minute tape based on hours of the proceedings. Anyone can splice a tape to make it look any way they want.

Why are you afraid to look at the entire proceedings? You know why. Because Frank McCloskey did in fact win the election.

The GAO and the Director of Elections chosen by the Republicans, I might add, indeed found him to be the winner.

SHOWING OF TAPE OF ENTIRE PROCEEDINGS OF ELECTION TASK FORCE

(Mr. COATS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. COATS. Mr. Speaker, just in reply to the gentlewoman from Ohio [Ms. OAKAR] who just spoke previously, perhaps the gentlewoman was not present on the floor when the leadership discussed the agreement between the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. FRENZEL], and the majority leader as to the fact that the entire proceedings would be shown to all House Members who are interested on Monday over House television.

So in response to a resolution passed by the Republican conference we feel that all of the proceedings are open to be seen and we welcome that you watch the entire thing.

Ms. OAKAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COATS. I am happy to yield.

Ms. OAKAR. Is it not true that there is a 14- or 15-minute spliced tape that was shown to your side of the aisle, and that the manner in which it was spliced outraged individuals?

I can understand that when it is put together in a manipulative way.

Is it true you have a tape like that?

Mr. COATS. If the gentlewoman would yield back the time, absolutely it is true. We did not have at our conference the privilege of watching all 6 hours, and so we had an edited version. And all Members have also had the opportunity to see the entire version, and many have seen that and watched it.

Ms. OAKAR. I hope the responsible Members will see the entire proceedings.

Mr. COATS. I hope so, too.

SENSE OF CONGRESS RESOLUTION REGARDING THE PRESIDENT'S VISIT TO THE FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY

(Mr. FASCELL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, at the appropriate time it would be my purpose to ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of a resolution in the House.

That resolution would express the sense of Congress that:

First, the U.S. Government should pay honor to the memories of the millions of innocent civilians and hundreds of thousands of American and allied soldiers who suffered and died at the hands of the Nazis;

Second, on the occasion of the 40th anniversary of the end of the Second World War, it is fitting and appropriate for the President, in a gesture of reconciliation, to visit the Federal Republic of Germany, a country which has taken its place among the community of democratic nations and which is now a friend and ally of the United States;

Third, the President should recognize the importance of the relationship between our Nation and the Federal Republic of Germany by paying tribute to appropriate symbols of that Nation's current democracy; and Fourth, the President should reconsider the inclusion of the Bitburg Cemetery in his forthcoming trip to the Federal Republic of Germany.

THE PRESIDENT'S VISIT TO BITBURG CEMETERY

(Mr. SCHUMER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SCHUMER. Mr. Speaker, today, as the gentleman from Florida [Mr. FASCELL] has stated, it is his intention to bring up a resolution urging the President to reconsider his visit to Bitburg.

It has been told to us that the whip on the other side will object to bringing this resolution before us. I would beseech that whip, the good gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOTT] not to do that.

This is an issue that transcends party politics. Many people, including the good gentleman from Mississippi, have spoken out against the President visiting Bitburg.

I cannot tell you, sir, in my district, which has more Holocaust survivors than any other in the country, the depth of the anguish felt about the President continuing on this course.

He does not intend to do wrong, but he is doing wrong. He is making a large segment of the American people feel that their suffering went in vain.

These are people who love America, who are proud of America, as we all are. And yet when the President visits a Nazi cemetery where SS members are buried, he is slapping them in the face.

Please, I say to the gentleman from Mississippi, do not object, and let this resolution go through.

VOTE FOR A SPECIAL ELECTION IN INDIANA'S EIGHTH CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICT

(Mr. GINGRICH asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, last night there were 47 Democrats, I believe, who showed great courage in voting for what they believed in, in order to save freedom in Central America. They resisted pressures from within their own party and resisted pressure from many organized groups, and they did what they thought was right.

Next Tuesday there will be an opportunity to vote for a special election in Indiana. In a situation so totally muddled that there is not a single newspaper in the country that is endorsing the Democratic leadership effort to seat one person by a 4-vote margin out of 234,000, I would hope that every Democrat will look at the example of the 47 last night and will show us a step toward bipartisanship and toward an opportunity to have a rational rest of the session by voting for a special election and not voting for the leadership position. And, indeed, possibly even convincing the leadership to change their mind and vote for a special election.

THE PRESIDENT'S VISIT TO BITBURG

(Mr. TORRICELLI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. TORRICELLI. Mr. Speaker, I, too, want to speak with the regret that this House today will not be able to address the President and give him the advice that he needs to receive.

We have all admired the President in his ability to communicate, to seize symbols.

In his coming visit to Germany he will seize the wrong symbol. That is an error of many dimensions.

It should not become a partisan issue. We should not be divided in giving the President the advice that he must receive.

We do not say the President should not seek a symbol of reconciliation with the people of Germany. But there are many symbols. This is the wrong one. Bitburg is a symbol of German soldiers who led American troops to a clearing and murdered them. It is a symbol of the SS who conspired to construct a death machine unprecedented in the world. And it is an opportunity for the Soviet Union to use as propaganda the wrong symbol of America seizing back into the past.

THE EIGHTH DISTRICT OF INDIANA ELECTION DISPUTE

(Mr. MYERS of Indiana asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. MYERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, earlier today the gentleman from Missouri, our colleague, praised the task force from the House Administration Committee for its great job which it did in the Eighth District of Indiana in conducting the recount. And the task force did direct that recount. But the gentleman from Missouri did ask the question: If four votes is not enough, how many is enough? How many are enough? I would remind the gentleman, and I know he has left the floor, that 34 votes majority was not enough on January 3 when it was for the Republican candidate; 417 majority was not enough on February 7 when, again, they cast their votes for the Republican candidate. But in some way four is enough now.

During that earlier vote I heard several of the majority party Democrats speaking about, "Yes, it is a hot issue here, the election in Indiana, but not in our districts."

Well, let me tell you, I spoke last night in Virginia to a churchmen's group. I spoke about the spiritual aspect of Members of Congress, about our prayer group that many of us do participate in weekly. I did not talk about politics.

I spoke about 15 minutes.

The last 15 minutes I left open for questions and answers.

The very first question, the second, third, and fourth questions asked of me had nothing to do with activities of this House, as far as economic problems of the country.

In Virginia they asked about what is happening to that stolen election in Indiana? Well, if you think it is not an issue in your home district, you may be fooled. It will be if it is not now, I can assure you.

THE VISIT OF THE PRESIDENT TO BITBURG

(Mr. WYDEN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to say in my 1-minute to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOTT] that I think it is very unfortunate that the American people are not going to have a chance to debate and have an opportunity to hear this resolution which is of a very mild nature. The resolution asks only that the President reconsider his position to go to the Bitburg Cemetery. That decision has brought pain to millions of Americans. It has brought pain to thousands of World War II veterans who left their youth on the battlefields of Germany and Eastern Europe in the fight to end Nazi terrorism and preserve freedom of religion, freedom of speech, and freedom of thought.

It has brought pain to the families of those thousands of other courageous Americans whose lives were taken from them in the same noble endeavor.

The resolution that we seek to debate today does not condemn the President, it does not even request that he cancel his visit, it asks only that he reconsider his decision and look at other options.

There are many other options where the President could honor non-Jewish German nationals who fought the Nazi terrorism. We hope he would do so.

THE "GOOD" INTENTIONS OF THE NICARAGUAN GOVERNMENT

(Mr. WALKER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, yesterday we received a lot of assurances on the floor about the "good" intentions of the Nicaraguan Government. I would like to show some of those statements by reading from the RECORD here, a statement from yesterday.

Mr. MACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. WALKER. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. MACK. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, under rule XVI does the gentleman have permission to quote from the RECORD?

Mr. WALKER. I do not.

PERMISSION TO READ FROM CONGRESSIONAL RECORD

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent under rule XVI to quote from the RECORD.

Mr. MACK. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is heard.

MOTION OFFERED BY MR. WALKER

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I move that I be permitted under rule XVI to quote from the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is whether under rule XXX the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER] should be permitted to read.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 351, nays 14, answered "present" 6, not voting 62, as follows:

Messrs. KINDNESS, LIVINGSTON, PETRI, DORNAN of California, and ZSCHAU changed their votes from "yea" to "nay."

Mr. LEATH of Texas and Mr. PANETTA changed their votes from "nay" to "yea."

Mr. OBEY and Mr. STUDDS changed their votes from "yea" to "present."

So the motion was agreed to.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. ROBINSON). The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER] is recognized for 30 seconds.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the Chair.

The RECORD of April 24, 1985 on page 9222, has this statement:

> The Hamilton substitute adopts a carrot-and-stick approach that makes clear congressional concern about the Sandinistas' close links to Cuba and the Soviet Union, their violations of human rights, and their efforts to destabilize the region. These are specified along with removal of a military adviser and the offer of economic and development programs.

That was used to say that the Hamilton substitute was tough.

I do not think that Mr. Ortega was listening. He headed for the Soviet Union.

REQUEST FOR CONSIDERATION OF HOUSE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 130, EXPRESSING SENSE OF CONGRESS WITH RESPECT TO PRESIDENT'S VISIT TO FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration in the House of a concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 130) expressing the sense of the Congress with respect to the President's visit to the Federal Republic of Germany in May 1985, which I send to the desk.

If consent is granted, I would yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD] and reserve 15 minutes to myself.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the title of the concurrent resolution.

The Clerk read the title of the concurrent resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

Mr. LOTT. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I understood that the policy that had been announced by the Speaker was that the House was directed that it was not in order to bring up legislation by unanimous consent unless that request had been cleared with the leadership on both sides, to wit: it also says that should include the majority and minority floor leadership, and committee and subcommittee chairmen and ranking minority members.

I was not notified. I am under the impression the gentleman from Texas, the majority floor leader, was not notified, and, therefore, I presume that the Speaker, the Chair, in this case, would not recognize this unanimous-consent request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Would the gentleman from Florida advise the Chair what clearance he has?

Mr. FASCELL. If the gentleman would yield——

Mr. LOTT. Further reserving the right to object, I will be glad to yield.

Mr. FASCELL. The matter was cleared on our side.

Mr. LOTT. Was it cleared with the majority leader on your side, the majority floor leader?

Mr. FASCELL. And it was cleared on your side, with your leader, and ranking member of the full committee. Well, I am not sure who the leader is over there. And also with the chairman of the subcommittee.

Mr. LOTT. Further reserving the right to object, now, Mr. Chairman, let's don't start that kind of stuff.

Mr. FASCELL. I am trying to give the gentleman, as I gave my colleagues on the committee and the leadership on the minority side, absolute assurance, because the Speaker would not take this matter up until I had given him that assurance. I got that assurance on your side. After getting that done, you came on the floor and objected. I respect your position, and I assume you are part of the leadership and you have a right to object if you want to. But do not question my integrity when I say it was cleared.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, I am going to respond to that. Further reserving the right to object, it says, on page 476, House Rules and Manual:

> The Chair has established a policy of conferring recognition of all Members to permit consideration of bills and resolutions by unanimous consent only when assured that the majority and minority floor leadership * * *.

I am under the impression that the majority leader was not notified.

Is the Chair prepared to rule on whether or not this is going to be recognized for a unanimous-consent request, based on that?

Mr. FASCELL. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

It seems to me that the gentleman is on his feet either to object or not object, and I wish he would go on and do something.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, it is not in order, based on this rule, that I understand is in place, and I am inquiring if the Chair is going to rule that way itself. It would not be necessary for anybody else to object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair feels there is sufficient assurance of clearance.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is heard.

PROVIDING FOR CONSIDERATION OF H.R. 2068, DEPARTMENT OF STATE, U.S. INFORMATION AGENCY, AND BOARD OF INTERNATIONAL BROADCASTING AUTHORIZATIONS, 1986 AND 1987

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 137 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That at any time after the adoption of this resolution the Speaker may, pursuant to clause 1(b) of rule XXIII, declare the House resolved into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for consideration of the bill (H.R. 2068) to authorize appropriations for fiscal years 1986 and 1987 for the Department of State, the United States Information Agency, the Board of International Broadcasting, and for other purposes, and the first reading of the bill shall be dispensed with. All points of order against the bill for failure to comply with the provisions of clause 5(a) of rule XXI are hereby waived. After general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed one hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the bill shall be considered for amendment under the five-minute rule by titles instead of by sections, and each title shall be considered as having been read. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

□ 1320

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BONIOR] is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield the customary 30 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. TAYLOR], for purposes of debate only, pending which I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 137 is a 1-hour open rule providing for consideration of H.R. 2068. The Department of State Authorization Act for fiscal years 1986 and 1987, with the time to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The rule also waives points of order against the bill for violations of clause 5(a) of rule XXI. Clause 5(a) prohibits appropriations in a legislative bill. This waiver is necessary because a number of provisions in the bill allow new uses of already appropriated funds, or could otherwise be interpreted as appropriations.

The rule also provides that the bill shall be read for amendment by titles instead of by sections, with each title considered as having been read. Finally, Mr. Speaker, the rule provides for one motion to recommit.

The purpose of H.R. 2068 is to authorize appropriations for fiscal years 1986 and 1987 for the Department of State, the U.S. Information Agency, and the Board for International Broadcasting (which makes grants to Radio Free Europe and Radio Liberty). Included are funds for the administration of foreign affairs, international organizations and conferences, migration and refugee assistance, for the modernization of Voice of America, and for the National Endowment for Democracy.

This legislation is essential to maintain the day-to-day operations of our foreign policy throughout the world. I would like to commend the Committee on Foreign Affairs for its expeditious action on this legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I urge the adoption of this rule.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, there was no controversy concerning this rule in the Rules Committee. Both the Republican and the Democrat representing the Foreign Affairs Committee asked for this procedure, and the Rules Committee agreed.

This rule provides 1 hour of general debate and an open amending procedure for the bill authorizing the State Department, the USIA, and the Board of International Broadcasting. The Board of International Broadcasting includes both Radio Free Europe and Radio Liberty.

The rule includes a waiver of the prohibition against appropriations on a legislative bill. The waiver protects two sections of the bill which technically could allocate previously appropriated funds for a new purpose.

Mr. Speaker, this State Department authorization bill was originally reported as H.R. 1931. Because two of the sections of that bill fell within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Public Works and Transportation, the Committee on Foreign Affairs decided to bring a new bill to the Rules Committee. The new bill, H.R. 2068, is identical to the old except that the two provisions within the jurisdiction of the Public Works Committee have been dropped.

Mr. Speaker, at the time of the Rules Committee meeting, the administration sent a policy statement supporting the State Department authorization only if it is amended.

Mr. Speaker, under this open rule procedure, necessary improvements may be made on the bill. I support the rule in order to give the House an opportunity to make necessary improvements in this legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentlewoman from Maine [Ms. SNOWE].

Ms. SNOWE. I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the rule for H.R. 2068, the State Department authorization. As my colleague from Ohio has explained, it is an open rule allowing for 1 hour of general debate.

This rule allows any germane amendments, and although I strongly support the committee bill, I do plan to support the amendment that will be offered by the gentleman from Florida and myself, to reduce the authorizations contained in the bill to the fiscal year 1985 spending level. This amendment would reduce funding for the Voice of America modernization and for the National Endowment for Democracy by a total of $27.353 million, thus bringing the total funds authorized by the bill to the same amount funded in fiscal year 1985.

I want to congratulate my colleague from Florida [Mr. MICA] for the outstanding leadership he provided on this legislation. He has done an excellent job in working with all members of the committee, and has produced a bill that addresses a number of important issues. I also want to commend my colleagues on the committee and subcommittee for their value contributions to this legislation. The bill we reported gives important policy direction to the State Department, the U.S. Information Agency, and the Board for International Broadcasting. I believe it is responsive to the concerns and views expressed to us by Secretary Shultz and other officials of the administration, and has strong bipartisan support from the members of the Foreign Affairs Committee.

It is important to note that the bill we originally reported from committee was only $27.353 million over the fiscal year 1985 level, which is a clear indication that the committee did a good job in controlling expenditures. The amendment, which those of us on the committee will urge you to support, would simply make two further adjustments, to bring the bill in at the same level as fiscal year 1985.

Mr. Speaker, I will go into further detail on this legislation during general debate. I hope the Members will support the rule, and then support the amendment to freeze spending. I urge Members to then approve H.R. 2068.

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. MICA].

Mr. MICA. I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the rule for H.R. 2068, which will authorize appropriations for fiscal years 1986 and 1987 for the Department of State, the U.S. Information Agency, and the Board for International Broadcasting.

This legislation contains few new initiatives or authorities. For the most part, it funds existing and tested programs. It is a nuts and bolts, no frills piece of legislation which provides close to minimum funding levels for these agencies to adequately carry out their duties and missions.

We are asking for a rule that will allow all those concerned to participate in the discussions of the merits of this legislation and if they see fit, try to effectuate change. It is a good rule, it is a good bill, and I urge all of my colleagues to support it.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOTT].

Mr. LOTT. I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is any objection to this rule. It is basically an open rule. We will get to the general debate, and perhaps a whole series of amendments on the State Department authorization. I hope my colleagues will look at it very closely, because as we enter this time when we are trying to find ways to reduce the deficit and to save money or to freeze the expenditures at the previous year or go below that, I think that a lovely place to start would be the State Department authorization.

If you cannot save a little money in the State Department, I just wonder where in the world we are going to save it. I am speaking as a Representative of the Fifth Congressional District of Mississippi; not necessarily on behalf of the leadership, but I think we should scrutinize the State Department authorization very closely to make sure there is not one dime in there that could be saved.

I just wanted to get that frame of thinking in the mix, during the rule, and early so that we will all go over it very carefully. Now, I have to give credit to the committee. Fortunately, they have honed it down pretty good, and I have been looking around for a place to put some amendments, and it has been hard to find them, but I think we ought to all start this year off by analyzing very closely every piece of legislation. A good place to start would be the State Department authorization.

Mr. MICA. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOTT. I would be glad to yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. MICA. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I would just like to make the point that when we addressed this legislation initially we had an agreement with majority and minority staff that we would do everything we could to bring this bill to the floor at the request level of the President, or below the President's request level.

As a matter of fact, that was our goal and we attained that goal by bringing in the 2-year authorization for $40 million less than the President requested. I might point out that in doing that, we think we addressed the concerns that both sides share in the modernization efforts of Radio Free Europe and the Voice of America, and we still made the cuts and we still made the adjustments in a way that had total bipartisan support in the committee.

So that was our goal, continues to be our goal, and even after we reduced the $40 million this gentleman will introduce a freeze amendment that will further cut the entire legislation to last year's level.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, if I may reclaim my time, that is a question that I was going to ask the gentleman.

I understand that this authorization is still over the fiscal year 1985 appropriation level; is that correct?

Mr. MICA. It is over, but it will not be when the freeze amendment is offered.

Mr. LOTT. There will be an amendment that will freeze it at last years level?

Mr. MICA. yes.

Mr. LOTT. I think that would certainly help my feelings for it. We certainly should not be allowing the State Department authorization to exceed the 1985 level. If we are going to move forward with our effort to freeze all these bills or go below the freeze, we should not let this one get by.

Mr. MICA. I would just remind the gentleman that within this legislation obviously, and this is an issue that every single Member of this body is concerned with, lies funding for security in our embassies around the world, lies a great deal of the money that we added at a time when we had some concerns.

So we tried to make those reductions and still address it, and indeed we have.

Mr. LOTT. I appreciate the gentleman saying that, but you raise a good point. I am familiar with some of the embassies around the country and some of the funds available to our Ambassadors in various countries. There are some very sensitive, dangerous places in the world where there is unbelievable terrorism and we should take whatever actions are necessary to protect them.

There are some embassies, though, in situations that are nothing of that kind, and I think if we would look at some of those budgets of our embassies, we could make some savings. Security, yes. Entertainment, no.

Mr. MICA. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER].

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Speaker, I wanted to make mention of a couple of other amendments that will be offered in the course of deliberation of the bill that we will have before us.

One of those amendments will seek to utilize our embassies around the world as a focal point for attempting to achieve freedom of the press in some of the countries that do not allow free press access. There is considerable question as to how you operate in a democracy when you are inundated with disinformation from countries that do not allow the United States or anybody else to have true free press access in their country.

So an amendment will be offered to the bill that will attempt to assure that we get our embassies' cooperation in getting fundamentally more free press access in those countries around the world.

The second amendment that will be offered—and I think the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SILJANDER], the ranking member on the African Subcommittee, will offer this, and I certainly want to cosponsor it with him—will be an amendment to mandate the Sullivan principles on our Embassy in South Africa.

Many of our businesses doing business in South Africa operate under the Sullivan code, designed to end discrimination, designed to assure that black workers in South Africa are treated with proper respect and given training and make certain that they are given the opportunities. At the present time, our Embassy is one of the worst employment situations in South Africa and it is, I think, incumbent upon this body to do there whatever we can to remedy that situation.

So we will be offering an amendment that would say in South Africa that the Embassy of the United States ought to abide by the Sullivan principles.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I also have no further requests for time, I yield back the balance of my time, and I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the resolution.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. SENSENBRENNER. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

Mr. BROWN of Colorado changed his vote from "yea" to "nay."

Mr. FRANK changed his vote from "nay" to "yea."

So the motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

MOTION TO CORRECT THE CONGRESSIONAL RECORD

Mr. WEBER. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Motion offered by Mr. WEBER: MR. WEBER moves to correct the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD by striking out on page 2281 the remarks beginning with the words "We" down to and including the word "confederation" and inserting the word "are" before "a".

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not believe the motion as offered by the gentleman states a question of privilege.

Mr. WEBER. Mr. Speaker, I appeal the ruling of the Chair.

MOTION TO TABLE OFFERED BY MR. FOLEY

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move to lay the appeal on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion to lay on the table offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. FOLEY].

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. WEBER. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. BEREUTER changed his voted from "yea" to "nay."

So the motion to lay the appeal on the table was agreed to.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED

Bills of the Senate of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and, under the rule, referred as follows:

S. 817. An act to authorize appropriations under the Earthquake Hazards Reduction Act of 1977 for fiscal years 1986 and 1987, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs and Science and Technology.

S. 818. An act to authorize appropriations for activities under the Federal Fire Prevention and Control Act of 1974; to the Committee on Science and Technology.

MOTION TO ADJOURN

(Mr. FOLEY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention in this 1 minute to go over the circumstances that have led us to this unfortunate circumstance in the conduct of business on the floor of the House of Representatives, but it is clear to me, and I think to most of our Members, that further effort to proceed with the authorization bill for the Department of State is not going to be possible this afternoon, at least in an orderly and effective way.

I regret that, because this is an authorization bill for one of the principal departments of Government, supported by the administration and brought to the floor at their request. But at least for the moment I think that the business for this day and this week has been ended for any constructive purpose.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. FOLEY. Accordingly, Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 201, nays 153, not voting 79, as follows:

SENATE—Thursday, April 25, 1985

(Legislative day of Monday, April 15, 1985)

The Senate met at 11:30 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the President pro tempore [Mr. THURMOND].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Our prayer will be offered by the Reverend Father Jerome L. Cummings, St. Bruno's Church, Whittier, CA. He is sponsored by Senator PETE WILSON of California.

PRAYER

The Reverend Father Jerome L. Cummings, St. Bruno's Church, Whittier, CA, offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

Our Heavenly Father, 120 years have passed since the guns fell silent at Appomattox. It was altogether fitting that they did so, in a place devoted to the cause of law. For You gave us, Father, the power to birth this Nation, and endow it with law for personal freedom, justice, and liberty. We came so close then, in our civil division, that we nearly destroyed it.

Little did we know, scarcely did we realize, that America would once again stand upon the brink, not just of national dismemberment, but within a world family that chose to approach the brink of nuclear extinction. Some would approach this brink by disarmament alone, letting history take the consequences. Others would approach that brink only with sheer superiority of arms. Still others would approach that brink by equity of measurable strength. None would however, cease to approach the brink. And so the brink came.

Our prayer, Father, is for those who labor for peace in this room. We ask a threefold blessing and our own anthem of resolve: Give them a sense of their dignity as lawmakers. The purpose of law is justice. Justice seeks no confrontation. Thus no one is threatened. Bless them with a clarity of vision for truth alone. In it there is nothing to fear, and relieves that narrowness of mind that is partisan, greedy, and selfish. Grant them courage to work only for the freedom of each human being, his right to have it, and the liberty to express it.

If You grant this blessing, then the peace and serenity of Appomattox will endure, and the vindication of these lawmakers will lie not in knowing they were right, but in the fruits of peace obtained for another generation and an age as yet unborn. To this purpose, let them resolutely dedicate themselves once more to pledge their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor. This time, they dare not fail.

Father, this is our prayer. May there be peace in this land. Make us a people of peace. Let it begin with me. Amen.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The distinguished majority leader is recognized.

SCHEDULE

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, under the standing order, the two leaders have 10 minutes each and then special orders not to exceed 15 minutes each for Senators PROXMIRE, WALLOP, and MURKOWSKI, followed by routine morning business not to extend beyond the hour of 1 p.m. with statements therein limited to 5 minutes each.

Following routine morning business, it will be the intention of the majority leader to begin consideration of Senate Concurrent Resolution 32, the budget resolution, under a statutory time limitation of 50 hours.

I would indicate to my colleagues or members of their staffs that we can expect rollcall votes today and tomorrow. As I have indicated, there will be no Saturday session. It would appear that we could expect rollcall votes on Monday and throughout all of next week. There are going to be, I would guess, depending on how everything hangs together, or whatever, rather late sessions next week and perhaps a fairly late session tonight.

EXPRESSION OF THANKS TO SENATOR THURMOND

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I would also take this opportunity to thank the distinguished President pro tempore, my colleague and the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, for his kind and thoughtful remarks concerning my experience 40 years ago in Italy, which appears in the RECORD of April 24, 1985, on page S4681. I thank my colleague for his friendship and for the recognition indicated therein.

Mr. President, I reserve the balance of my time.

RECOGNITION OF THE ACTING MINORITY LEADER

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ARMSTRONG). Under the previous order, the acting Democratic leader is now recognized.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Democratic leader's time be reserved for his later use.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR PROXMIRE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE] is recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

HOW SUPERPOWERS HAVE FAILED TO BUILD ARMS CONTROL ON PAST SUCCESSES

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, on previous days I have detailed two requirements for the achievement of a successful arms control policy for this country. The third requirement is to recognize that arms control must build on past successes. The fundamental objective of arms control is to establish a lasting prevention of nuclear war. We can only achieve that objective if we use successive arms control treaties as a continuing process aimed steadily at stopping the arms race.

What real hope is there that we can do this? The framework for precisely that kind of progress was established by two superpower nuclear weapons treaties. But, to date, we have kicked away the golden opportunity that offered to advance the cause of peace.

The 1963 Test Ban Treaty gave the superpowers the clearest commitment to stop the arms race at its heart. In the preamble to that treaty, the United States and the Soviet Union subscribe to the following language:

> Seeking to achieve the discontinuance of all test explosions of nuclear weapons for all time, determined to continue negotiations to this end (the signatories) have agreed as follows.

In the 1974 treaty between the two superpowers the pledge is even more explicit and is moved out of the preamble right down into the articles of agreement. Paragraph 3 of article 1 of that treaty reads as follows in its entirety:

> The parties shall continue their negotiations with a view toward achieving a solution to the problem of the cessation of all underground nuclear weapons tests.

Now, Mr. President, that is about as explicit and absolutely unmistakable commitment as the officials of two nations could possibly make. It is a firm, unqualified pledge to continue negotiations to end nuclear weapons testing. The United States and the Soviet Union are in conspicuous violation of that promise. The two superpowers made it not once in a treaty, but twice. They promised in two treaties. The pledge was made 20 years ago in 1963, and again 11 years ago in 1974. The agreement recognized in both treaties that the partial limitations on nuclear testing would make little real progress toward peace unless the superpowers kept their word. The superpowers gave their word. Since then, both superpowers have turned their backs on their commitment. And what is the result? The result is that while the treaties began the critical process of ending the arms race, the failure of the U.S. and the U.S.S.R. to keep their promise has made that historic beginning a virtual nullity. What possible alibi can there be for this refusal to keep the promise of 1963, so emphatically repeated in 1974? Were there developments in nuclear weapons technology that made the promise impossible or even more difficult to observe? No. Quite the contrary. Our seismologists tell us that the present 150 kiloton limit on underground nuclear weapons explosions by no means sets the limits on the ability to verify nuclear explosions. They have asserted that we could successfully monitor virtually any test explosion that would have any real military significance. Is verification of such a ban on nuclear weapons testing actually more practical than it was when these pledges were made? The answer is: "Yes." There are two reasons why the commitments of 1963 and 1974 are not less, but more practical today—in 1985 than they were 22 years ago, or 11 years ago. First the seismic technology which was excellent at the time of the two treaties and could have reliably monitored explosions well below the limit set in 1974 has actually improved since. Second, there have been repeated indications that the Soviet Union with the immense advantage it possesses as a closed society in resisting verification would—if negotiations were pressed—agree to the placement of a number of monitoring stations, perhaps 10 or more, within the Soviet Union to assure this country that we could verify Soviet nuclear weapons test explosions down to a single kiloton or less.

Now, Mr. President, keep in mind what is at stake here. If the superpowers should agree to keep their clear and solemn pledge to negotiate a total "cessation of all underground nuclear weapons tests," the most critical element in the nuclear arms race will be achieved. When I stated these series of speeches I said that—

The failure of the superpowers even to try to comply with that promise to cease all nuclear weapons testing represents the most significant lost opportunity for peace of the last 25 years.

No matter what other progress we might make on arms control, without an agreement to cease all nuclear weapons tests, the achievement of the end of the arms race will slip through our fingers like quick silver. We can ban every single nuclear weapon: Intercontinental ballistic missiles, cruise missile, intermediate missiles, and every tactical nuclear weapon in the arsenal of the United States and the Soviet Union. Would that end the arms race? No way. Both superpowers would do exactly what they have been doing since the first arms control limitation was achieved. They would be researching and testing to develop new nuclear weapons, probably more devastating than either superpower carries in its arsenal at present, but outside the limits proscribed by the arms control agreements. Only a full and comprehensive ban on all nuclear testing can go to the heart of the arms race: That heart is the testing essential to the development of new nuclear weapons.

The superpowers have solemnly not once, but twice in treaties promised to do precisely what we need to do to stop the arms race. There is little hope of arms control if with such a clear and absolute commitment we cannot build on that solid beginning. If ever this great country should keep its word, this is the issue and this is the time.

ARMENIAN GENOCIDE

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, on another subject, today marks the 70th anniversary of one of the most atrocious acts in history, the slaughter of over 1 million Armenians by the Turkish Government during World War I. It was these brutal acts that first lead Raphael Lemkin to term the phrase "genocide."

Just as in the case of the Holocaust and the current German Government, there is no implication of guilt for the Armenian Genocide to the present Turkish Government. Yet the Turkish Government is attempting to deny the genocide. Mr. President, the Armenian genocide must not, and cannot be forgotten. It cannot be forgotten because news reports of the day provide a shocking portrait of the murder of the Armenians.

People may disagree with the editorial policy of the New York Times, but I know of no one who questions its integrity and the honesty of its reports.

On March 20, 1915, the New York Times reported that "the whole plain of Alacgend is virtually covered with the bodies of men, women, and children" and that "the Red Cross fund says there are 120,000 destitute Armenians in the Caucuses."

The news got worse as time went on. A Reuters report from August 20, 1915, states that "in one village 1,000 men, women, and children are reported to have been locked in a wooden building and burned to death."

The most shocking report comes from the September 16, 1915, New York Times in which a correspondent reports that, "It is the official intention that this shall be a campaign of extermination involving the murder of 800,000 to 1,000,000 persons."

Mr. President, in standing by and saying nothing while the history of the Armenian genocide is rewritten, we indeed may make Hitler's question of "Who still talks of the Armenian genocide?" mere rhetoric.

That was made, incidentally, in 1938 in the middle of Hitler's extermination of the Jews when he was defending his position and arguing that the international community did not care.

However, the correspondent also reported that "Christians could escape death by embracing Mohammodanism, in which case all of the female members of the convert's family of marriageable age—wife, sisters, or children—are distributed around to other Turks, making the conversion to Christianity in the future practically impossible."

Mr. President, we must commemorate the Armenian genocide, particularly in face of the effort to deny it. But to remember is not enough; we must act. We must act to see that genocide is ended now and forever. We must ratify the Genocide Convention.

FINANCIAL HOLDINGS AND INCOME TAX RETURN OF SENATOR WILLIAM PROXMIRE

Mr. PROXMIRE. Finally, Mr. President, in 1963, 1965, 1967, and 1970, and yearly since 1972, I have submitted for the record a history of my financial holdings from the time I was first elected to the Senate in 1957 until May 1984. In order to bring the full record up to date, I submit herewith the history of my financial holdings since May 1984.

My assets include ownership of a home in Madison WI, on which I owe a mortgage to the former owners; ownership of my home and furnishings in Washington, DC, on which I owe a mortgage to the Perpetual American Federal Savings of Washington, DC; ownership of a 1980 automobile; ownership of one checking account in a Washington, DC, bank, one checking account in a Madison, WI, bank and one savings account in a Madison, WI, bank. I hold State and municipal bonds totalling $70,000.

I estimate my net worth to be about $563,000.

To the best of my knowledge, this is an accurate record of my financial holdings and obligations.

I herewith submit a balance sheet showing my net worth and how it was arrived at and a copy of my 1984 Federal income tax return.

I paid $34,214 to the Federal Government in taxes on my 1984 income. In addition, I paid $11,487 to the State of Wisconsin on 1984 income.

I ask unanimous consent that the balance sheet and copy of my 1984 Federal tax return be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR WALLOP

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WALLOP] will be recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, I thank the Chair.

AID TO NICARAGUA

Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, history will record that the Carter administration began to aid those who wanted to stop the Sandinistas from turning Nicaragua into a totalitarian ally of Moscow, and that in the Reagan administration such aid stopped. That is the bottom line.

History will record that the Democratic Party, almost united, convinced the Reagan administration again and again to reduce the size and scope of its requests for support to the Nicaragua resistance, and to make those requests with ever less conviction. Indeed only by great efforts, and by the President's intervention, was the administration dissuaded from joining in sponsoring a congressional resolution that would have sealed its own defeat. Now as congressional Democrats step forward to accept the thanks of the Communist dictator Daniel Ortega, the hemisphere's new Cuba faces a much less complicated future.

Yet blame does not lie alone with congressional apologists for the Brezhnev doctrine. Our 535 "secretaries of state" have been aided and indeed urged on by an indecisive administration.

This Senator watched with growing dismay as representatives of the State Department and CIA explained this administration's policy toward Nicaragua in the absurd terms of "interdicting the flow of arms" to El Salvador. This Senator was astonished when the administration helped to quash opposition to the Boland amendment. This Senator listened with disgust as spokesmen for the administration prided themselves on supplying the Nicaraguan resistance with enough to fight and die, but with not enough to win. This Senator winced when the Sandinista government broadcast William Casey's public statements that the Contras could not possibly win.

This Senator noted that the administration's requests to the Congress on the Contras' behalf were accompanied neither by threats nor by the usual inducements. Indeed, Secretary Shultz' latest letter ostensibly in support of the President's request never even mentioned that request, much less supported it. The paper explaining so-called U.S. policy in the area was not even on anyone's letterhead. Neither the State Department, the CIA, nor the NSC would sully their reputations with it. Last fall, before the Senate voted by a margin of 15 votes in favor of the Nicaraguan resistance, the Department of State advised this Senator that the vote count in the Senate was negative, and refused to supply even a routine letter of support. Far from refusing to take "no" for an answer, this administration has courted it.

When anyone asks why so many in the Congress and the administration are so eager to disassociate themselves from the fate of the Nicaraguan resistance, we hear one word: Vietnam—we want to avoid another experience like that. Yet, this obfuscation of moral judgment, this abandonment of freedom-loving people to Communist rule after half-hearted effort is precisely what we did in Vietnam. The arguments of the so-called best and brightest on the liberal side today are almost in form to those we heard 20 years ago. We have to force the Contras into a deal with the Communists, for the sake of peace, they say—just like they spoke of the need to force the South Vietnamese into the deal we worked out with the Communists in Paris in 1973. "And if they don't we'll cut off their funds." Thus do our good liberals, Democratic and Republican alike, dangle the American taxpayers' money in front of people who are fighting for their lives and freedoms, and put themselves in greater danger. If they refuse, they are threatened with being thrown to the wolves. If they agree, they can hope that the liberals, in the Congress and the administration, will at least preserve their lives, even as their cause goes down the drain. Is this the way to avoid Vietnam? In Heaven's name, no. This is a recipe for repeating the experience of helicopters lifting off embassy roofs, say in Honduras and El Salvador, as U.S. marines with rifle butts smash the fingers of our "brothers" climbing over the walls.

But despite the similarities, there are vast differences between Southeast Asia and Central America. Yes, just like in Southeast Asia, as soon as we abandon our friends and the Communists win their civil war, they will take over neighboring countries, have bloodbaths, and provide military bases for the Soviets. But unlike in Southeast Asia, there is no ocean between this tragedy and our border. The refugees will come more quickly and in greater numbers. But something far more ominous will come soon: The sounds of Mexico accommodating itself into a vast, anti-Yankee alliance.

Today does not mark the end of our troubles with Central America—it is the beginning. Within weeks we will see bloody battles as the Sandinista regulars, many with Soviet Speznatz training, move into free-fire zones to kill the resistance. Then perhaps in a year or two or three we will see the attack on Honduras and El Salvador, whose leaders will try in vain to accommodate. Throughout these dramas, the American people are going to want to know who is responsible. They will ask each one of us "whose side are you on in this fight?" They will do so all the more pointedly if our President, Democratic or Republican, does his duty and sends American troops to save one of those countries. "Who made all this necessary? Who destroyed the resistance forces that were holding the Soviet coalition at bay in Nicaragua?" Then the American people will look at how each of us voted today and they will have the answer.

I am genuinely sorry for my country, because the administration and the Congress seem ready to betray people our President has called brothers. Brothers deserve better. The peoples of the world, friend and foe alike, are sure to ask themselves, if the Americans treat their brothers this way, how will they treat others? It is at least one saving grace that we do it openly by rollcall vote. I am happy to stand where I do, in favor of putting weapons, yes I say guns, into the hands of people who want to live democratically, and who want to shoot at the Soviets, Cubans, Vietnamese, Libyans, and PLO soldiers who have invaded the North American Continent. I say to those who will vote on the other side, go ahead, put your name on that list. America will regret it. So perhaps one day will you, too.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LAXALT). The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

(During the quorum call, the chair was occupied by Mr. CHAFEE.)

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STEVENS). Without objection, it is so ordered.

ADDRESS OF SENATOR DANFORTH ON U.S. TRADE POLICY

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, our distinguished colleague, the Senator from Missouri, Senator DANFORTH, today spoke before the National Press Club on the timely topic of the U.S. trade policy.

I know that every Member of the Senate is aware of Senator DANFORTH's energetic work as chairman of the International Trade Subcommittee of the Finance Committee. Both on the committee and on the trade subcommittee, I have worked closely with Senator DANFORTH on any number of issues affecting international trade. I commend Senator DANFORTH's remarks to my colleagues as an insightful discussion of U.S. trade policy, and I ask unanimous consent that the text of his address be included in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS BY SENATOR JOHN C. DANFORTH TO THE NATIONAL PRESS CLUB ON U.S. TRADE POLICY

Next week, in Bonn, the leaders of the free world will call for a new round of multilateral trade negotiations. If Congress does not extend the President's fast track legislative authority beyond its expiration date in early 1988, a new round would lead nowhere. Without fast track authority, the Tokyo Round could not have been implemented in 1979. Without an extension by Congress, a new round could not be implemented in the late 1980's.

There is no guarantee that Congress will extend fast track authority. Certainly, Congress should not agree to an extension without a thorough study of what has gone wrong in international trade and what the administration intends to do about it.

For years, trade policy has been the poor stepchild of our Government. It has been shoved to the back of the line, behind foreign policy and tax policy, behind antitrust policy and export controls, and behind any number of other considerations. For the sake of our own people as well as the international trading system itself, the era of second-class status must be brought to an end.

Today, I offer three propositions which should be debated before Congress gives the green light to a new round of trade negotiations.

Proposition I. An effective international trading system, fostering the principles of free trade, is clearly in the best interests of the United States and of the world.

Proposition II. The international trading system, as it exists today, is malfunctioning. Unless the system is made to work, it is doomed.

Proposition III. Congress needs to know that something is being done to fix the system before it grants new negotiating authority to the President.

That free trade is in the best interest of our country is so obvious to me that it went unstated in the first draft of these remarks. However, so many commentators have raised the specter of protectionism that a clear statement of principle is in order.

A return to protectionism would be a disaster for our country. It would threaten the jobs of one sixth of our work force, and it would destroy our farmers. It would increase consumer prices and reduce consumer choice. It would ruin our economy and the economies of our trading partners.

The Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act did contribute to the Great Depression. To repeat the same mistake more than half a century later would be an act of gross stupidity. The goal of the United States should be to open markets, not to close them.

The benefits of an open trading system to the rest of the world are no less obvious. In the past 2 years alone, America's open markets have been the main engine of world growth.

To insist that international agreements be enforced, and that unfair trade barriers be removed, is not protectism. The reason for negotiating international agreements and enacting enabling legislation is to provide a system for conducting world trade. Section 301 of the Trade Act gives the President the tools to open markets closed by unfair trade practices. It gives our people an opportunity to enjoy the benefits of free and fair competition. Clearly, a system that fosters such competition deserves all the support we can give it.

The second proposition is that the international trading system is malfunctioning. Our Government has neglected it. Other countries have abused it. What is happening today was never intended when GATT was established in 1947.

GATT was intended to operate for the mutual benefit of all its members. All were to benefit by the rules of free trade. All were to have access to world markets. All were to seek the benefits of comparative advantage.

In 1947, on one could have anticipated that a single country would run a $123 billion trade deficit in a single year. Nor could one have guessed our trade deficit's geometric rate of escalation since the beginning of this decade, up from $40 billion just 2 years ago.

The nature of our trade deficit has been changing as rapidly as its size. In the 1970's, we were importing fuel and raw materials. Last year, 72 percent of the deficit was manufactured goods. Nor are we offsetting the merchandise trade deficit by exported services and by returns on foreign investment as we were as recently as 1981. Last year, we ran a current account deficit of over $100 billion.

A number of causes have been cited for these ballooning numbers: The United States was first to recover from a worldwide recession, making our market far more lucrative than those of our trading partners. Huge debt obligations led Third World countries to restrict imports and subsidize exports. American business and labor are pricing themselves out of the world market. But two causes deserve special attention, neither of which was anticipated when GATT was establish: Floating exchange rates and the proliferation of nontariff barriers to trade.

When the world trading system was created, it did not anticipate a dollar which would rise or fall by the hour, which would change as money managers move billions overnight to a perceived safe haven, which would go up with U.S. interest rates and down with the closing of saving and loan associations in Ohio. It did not envision appreciations in currency which would effectively tax U.S. exports and subsidize U.S. imports.

Today, we are told that the overvalued dollars has the same effect as a 25-50 percent foreign tariff on American products, that it is the most important single cause of the trade deficit, and that the rules of international trade provide no way of relieving the problem. So, imports stifle economic recovery. Recovery bypasses key sectors of the economy, including agriculture, manufacturing, and mining. Import-sensitive and export-competitive industries fail or move offshore, and America's economic base is eroded forever.

No trade agreements, however sound, no trade laws, however well enforced, will give Americans a fair chance to compete in the international marketplace if an overvalued dollar has the same effect as a 25-50 percent tariff. To say this is not to belittle trade agreements. Rather it is to state the absolute necessity of dealing effectively with the exchange rate issue. One way or another, this problem must be solved.

The trade deficit is one of several reasons we must succeed in getting the Federal budget under control. The budget is the subject before Congress today, and no suggested trade measure should divert our attention from the goal of a $50 to $60 billion reduction in the budget deficit. To those who argue that the present furor over unfair trade practices is a distraction from the real problem of the budget, I repeat: Nothing can be allowed to distract us from the budget. The Federal budget must come first.

Yet there are those who argue that a serious reduction in the budget deficit will not reduce the value of the dollar, will not reduce it sufficiently or that it will have the opposite effect—that it will inspire even more confidence in the United States as a safe haven for foreign investment.

If this is so, if conventional wisdom about the link between the budget and exchange rates does not prove correct, then an unconventional way must be found to offset the effect of a high valued dollar.

Several unconventional ideas have been suggested. They include a strategic currency reserve, import surcharges, tax incentives for savings, a value-added tax and capital controls. I am not prepared at this time to endorse any of these ideas, especially since the better and more cautious suggestion of a reduced budget deficit has not been tried. I do say that no trade policy can work if the exchange rate problem is not resolved. I do say that if the dollar cannot be reduced by a budget resolution, then it must be offset by some other method.

Resolving the exchange rate problem is the sine qua non of effective trade policy. Yet even if we were to reduce the dollar, Americans would still not have access to other markets when nontariff barriers to our exports spring up faster than we remove them. Therefore, we must proceed on two tracks at the same time. We must deal with exchange rates, and we must remove unfair barriers to American exports.

When tariffs were the principal means of excluding imports, free trade seemed an attainable goal. Tariffs are visible, measurable, and easily reduced.

But today protectionist countries do not need to rely upon tariffs. Other, more subtle and equally effective barriers are at hand. These range from discriminatory standards to licensing to bureaucratic delay to restrictions on investment.

Much of our attention is on Japan, but it is not the only country with import barriers. We have them. Canada and Europe have then, and, with increasing significance so do developing countries.

What sets Japan apart is this: No other nation contributes so little to the open trading system in relation to its gains from that system. International trade cannot function effectively when the world's second largest economy abdicates its responsibilities to the system.

Today, our efforts to stop unfair trade practices are embarrassingly ineffective. It is embarrassing to watch the President of the United States plead with the Prime Minister of Japan. It is embarrassing to see one negotiating delegation after another return from Tokyo with hopeful announcements and no new sales. It is ineffective when our exports to Japan grow by 2 percent while our imports grow by 38 percent. Our efforts are embarrassingly ineffective, and, I submit, they are dangerous as well.

To the best of my knowledge, the United States has never used section 301 of the Trade Act to retaliate against Japan. Now retaliation is a nasty word. It suggests a loss of temper, a desire to strike back. Critics expressed that view when the Senate Finance Committee voted to retaliate against Japan.

But retaliation is not synonymous with a loss of temper or a desire to strike back in rage. Rather, section 301 gives the President authority for a measured response to unfair trade practices, in total conformity with GATT.

The strongest argument we use against our own protectionists—against, for example, advocates of domestic content legislation—is that American protectionism would lead to retaliation abroad. It would hurt our own people. We tell our own people that, when it comes to trade barriers, there is no free lunch.

Yet, by our inaction, we tell our trading partners that there is a free lunch. We tacitly let them know that they are free to impose whatever restrictions they like to imports from the United States and that we will do nothing. We will not use section 301 to retaliate no matter what.

At the present time, there is no practical disincentive to Japanese protectionism except the volume of rhetoric turned up by the Congress. A controlled response as provided by international rules and by our law is placed off limits by the administration. Therefore, uncontrolled rhetoric is all that remains. I think this is dangerous.

It is dangerous to the total relationship between the United States and one of its closest frields. For despite lively economic competition, we are close friends. We share common interests in a peaceful and prosperous world. We share a commitment to democratic government and free enterprise economics. It is hard to imagine a promising future for either country without the friendship and cooperation of the other.

Every time there is a vote in the Congress on a matter relating to trade with Japan, the claim is made that we are sending the Japanese a message. I am increasingly of the view that the Congress of the United States should not be in the business of sending messages to Japan. At best, messages which never lead to action are easily ignored. More seriously, messages sent in rage create long-term ill will. The role of Congress is to legislate, not to send messages to other countries.

In the long run, acquiescence to Japanese protectionism is no favor to either country. For both countries, and, indeed, the trading system itself are dependent on a strong American economy. America is no longer the dominant giant, towering over a struggling and self-protecting Japan. We no longer have the economic margins to tolerate the infant industry protectionism that brought about Japan's dominance in consumer electronics and automobiles. In no sector—such as computers and telecommunications—where the United States still maintains a competitive edge, can such Japanese protectionism be tolerated. There is no question that we are being hurt by Japan's trade practices, and when we are hurt, so is the rest of the world.

The 1984 Trade Act was an effort by Congress to find an effective way of removing unfair trade barriers without resorting to idle messages or verbal abuse. Congress strengthened section 301 of the 1974 act and created a systematic way of first identifying and then removing barriers to U.S. exports. In sum, the President was given added leverage to open markets which have been closed.

Nontariff barriers to trade multiply like mushrooms. They create a problem which can never be solved by inaction, which characterizes the administration, or by overreaction, which characterizes the Congress. The problem will only be solved by putting in place a system in which the President responds to barriers in a measured and practical way. The 1984 Trade Act was intended to create such a system.

No country in the free world can afford to see the trading system destroyed. But the system is doomed if it is not credible, and the only way to make it credible is to enforce our existing law, our existing rights.

Now to the third proposition: Congress should insist on clear plans for rectifying the exchange rate problem and for enforcing our rights under existing agreements as conditions for granting the President fast track authority for implementing a new negotiating round.

To the administration, a new round of multilateral negotiations is the first priority in the trade area. To me, a new round of negotiations belongs somewhere farther down the list. Indeed, since trade agreements cannot deal with the bloated dollar, I do not see how they can improve the position of Americans trying to compete in world markets. Also, I do not understand the wisdom of negotiating rules of international trade if there is no intention of enforcing the rules we negotiate.

It would be unreasonable for Congress to ask the impossible. But if deficit reductions do not start the dollar on a steady decline, then we should be prepared to use other options to deal with exchange rates now and in the future. Now is the time to begin the careful study of those options should they later be needed. In addition, the President must implement the reciprocity title of the 1984 Trade Act, and put in place an ongoing mechanism for identifying and removing unfair barriers to American exports. These matters are far more important than a new round of negotiations.

Nearly every discussion of the trade deficit yields the comment that the problem is of our own making. It is said that we don't try hard enough—that we can't produce attractive products at competitive prices. I close by saying that I don't accept those comments for a moment. I don't accept the view that America is soft, and lazy, and over the hill. If we continue to compete, I believe we will succeed. In many key sectors, we can compete anywhere in the world, but only if the dollar is fairly priced and only if our trading partners are made to play by the rules.

Government cannot do everything in America, but there are some things it can do. It can get its economic house in order. It can enforce the law. It can give American producers a fair chance. And Congress must insist that we do so before another round of negotiations get underway.

IS THERE AN ARGENTINA IN OUR ECONOMIC FUTURE?

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, the other day I received in the mail an interesting letter which I found most provocative and very timely.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the letter be printed in full at the conclusion of my statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. (See exhibit 1.)

Mr. WARNER. The letter was about government spending, about government deficits, and about inflation.

Attached to this letter was a 1 million peso note issued by the government of Argentina. The author of this letter wrote, "This million peso note had a value in U.S. currency in 1962 of more than three-quarters of a million dollars. As of June 1984, the value of the note was $2.50."

The reasons for Argentina's hyperinflation and tremendously devalued currency are twofold:

First, the spirit of free enterprise has been taxed away; and second, the federal government of Argentina has embarked on an excessive program of spending and expansion which killed all incentive for work and thrust that nation deeper and deeper in debt.

As a result, Argentina has no choice but to print more and more money in an effort to meet its government's and its citizens' spending needs.

For the present, we do not face this condition in the United States.

But indeed the possibility exists.

The United States today enjoys one of the lowest rates of inflation and one of the highest rates of economic growth ever experienced in its history.

But the United States is also experiencing the largest national debt, and the largest Federal deficit in its history—a history that saw 200 years pass before its first trillion dollar debt was accrued, but only 6 years to accumulate the second trillion dollar debt.

These conditions are compounded by a growing unwillingness on the part of many not to pay their legally owned taxes.

In 1981, the last year for which verified figures are available, some $90 billion in anticipated tax revenues were lost through either tax avoidance or taxpayer noncompliance schemes.

The Senate Finance Committee and the Internal Revenue Service estimate that this tax gap—the difference between what should be coming to the U.S. Treasury and what is actually received based on the numbers of working citizens and businesses—could be as high as $150 billion in 1985.

Collection of these taxes alone could begin to wipe out the national debt.

That's a reason for Congress to begin serious work on tax simplification legislation.

Remember, America's tax system works—primarily—because of the good faith of its citizens in complying with the law.

Let's simplify before we lose that good faith.

The simple fact of the matter is that our current tax laws, either because of their complexity or because of their perceived unfairness, are fostering this tax gap.

If this situation is not addressed, and addressed soon, we could very well find ourselves in the same situation as Argentina.

The Government could literally find itself in the position of having to print money and borrow even more than it already does to meet its spending requirements.

I never want to see a million dollar U.S. piece of currency devalued so severely.

To illustrate my point, let me share with you part of an article written by Roscoe Egger, Commissioner of the Internal Revenue Service, on the subject of tax reform.

Comparing two types of taxpayers—those involved in limited partnerships and a typical family of four with no tax shelters—Mr. Egger wrote:

> The average 1983 gross income of individuals in limited partnerships was $193,000.
> But their total income tax represented less than 5 percent of their gross income, while their losses—all legal under the present tax code—represented more than 90 percent of their gross.
> By comparison, a typical family of four with income of $45,000 and no tax shelter losses would pay $6,272 or more than 15 percent of their income in taxes.

According to a recent IRS survey, 75 percent of taxpayers believe their taxes are too high for what they get, and about two-thirds believe they pay more than their fair share.

Even worse, a whopping 80 percent of the taxpayers in this country believe the present system benefits the rich and is unfair to the ordinary working man and woman.

So what is the answer to this dilemma?

The President and I believe the answer can be found in tax reform * * * in the adoption of a plan that promotes fairness and simplicity.

We are joined in that belief by 80 percent of America's taxpayers.

Yet the Treasury's tax simplification proposal of last November was severely injured by Washington's special interest groups before it had traveled the short mile from the Treasury to Capitol Hill.

Nonetheless, I remain hopeful that a tax reform plan which benefits all Americans, which is fair and understandable, and which produces no more tax revenue than the present tax system, were there full taxpayer compliance, can be crafted and adopted this year.

Let's go to work and earn our pay, Congress.

Finally, Mr. President, we must put the lid on Government spending.

We must continue promoting economic growth.

And we must rewrite our tax laws so that they are fair, so that they promote taxpayer compliance, so that they provide the receipts needed to enable the Government to operate without printing and borrowing excessively to meet its obligation.

For truly, if we are not to become a Nation committed to Argentina's destiny, these tasks must be accomplished.

GRIFFIN AND BRAND OF MCALLEN, INC.,
McAllen, TX, January 29, 1985.

Hon. JOHN W. WARNER,
Russell Office Building,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR WARNER: Following is a copy of a letter I sent to the President and all members of Congress:

We, in general as the American people, are very much concerned about the increasing Federal deficit and its impact upon the national economy. We are also concerned very much about our national trade deficit.

I am enclosing to you a million peso note which is legal tender in Argentina. This million peso note is a very dramatic demonstration of the impact of our concern expressed above, in Argentina. This same million peso note had a value in U.S. currency in 1962 of $769,230.77. As of June 1984, the value of the note was $2.50.

Argentina is continuing to experience hyper inflation. This inflation is a result of excessive Federal expenditures. The areas of expenditures which are uncontrolled are the expansion of government, the social welfare program, government subsidies and excessive military expenditures. I believe the parallel is obvious.

It appears that the time has come for all of us, including those in public office, to recognize that we are on a road that many other nations have traveled and the end of the trip has been economic chaos. We believe that the solution to our Federal deficit spending will require courageous and sound economic non-political decisions.

The four areas which require immediate attention, in regard to reducing the deficit and ultimately the balancing of the Federal budget, very simply requires more efficient use of government funding and a reduction in the cost of government, social welfare programs and in the various subsidies, including those in agriculture, and certainly requires a reduction in military expenditures.

It is our prayer that you, the Senate and the House approach this New Year in an economically realistic manner and attitude and that there not be "politics as usual."

Briefly, concerning our trade deficit, my experience in more than 40 years of foreign trade and my observations while traveling throughout the world, of the loss of markets by the United States in many areas of industry, farm machinery, automobiles, chemicals, are very simply that management, government and organized labor together have created a wage level in major industry that has priced the American products out of the world marketplace and has opened up our country for an invasion of foreign made products.

There is much to be said and done if our nation is not to follow the course of nations such as Argentina. Argentina exceeded its capacity to borrow and turned to the bank of last resort, the printing press. Argentina is a government out of control economically.

I believe the people of this nation are willing to support the sort of leadership and effort that I have alluded in this brief letter. I am one of your supporters, an Eagle Republican, and your campaign manager in Hidalgo County, Texas in the recent election. I have great confidence in your leadership and please accept this letter in that spirit.

Very truly yours,

OTHAL E. BRAND,
Chairman of the Board.

P.S. I am sending a similar letter to each member of Congress and a few other selected persons. I hope you will frame this million peso note and keep it in a conspicuous place as a reminder of this great danger to our nation.

WE MUST BEAR WITNESS

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I have read over and over the memorable words written some time ago by Elie Wiesel: "For the dead and the living, we must bear witness." During this week, which marks the 40th anniversary of the liberation of the Nazi concentration camps, those words are most appropriate. The American Gathering of Jewish Holocaust Survivors which recently took place in Philadelphia along with other ceremonies worldwide has helped to fulfill the charge of Mr. Wiesel's words.

Unlike the survivors or the liberators, I do not have the vantage point of having personally witnessed the death camps or the slave labor camps. My perceptions of the Holocaust have been framed from books and conversations with liberators and survivors, and from watching films and documentaries. In that sense, I am like the overwhelming majority of Americans who were not eyewitnesses to the hell holes in Germany, Poland, and other Nazi controled areas. The list is long. Dachau, Auschwitz, Bergen-Belsen, Majdanek, Sobibor, Treblinka, and on and on. Six million grandparents, parents, and children in all. The number is unfathomable.

When I pick up a book on the Holocaust or when I watch a film with actual footage and photographs, I instinctively want to turn my eyes away. Nobody wants to look at the piles of corpses and at the individuals, the Jews, who were dying in inhumane agony. My mind cannot comprehend the horror and the terror of assembly line exterminations, the tortures, and the deaths. Any words that I could use to express my shock and revulsion and outright disbelief would be gross understatements of what we all feel inside. Yet we must look at these pictures and read these books if we are to keep the Holocaust experience fresh in our minds. The Holocaust has left an indelible scar on the integrity of the human race, and civilization will never be able to shake its responsibility for the calculated deaths of the millions of our brothers in the human family. The damage has been done, and for those who are to this day haunted by the cold memories of the Holocaust, the damage is still being done.

While we cannot change history, we can and must learn from it. We must learn that the value of each and every human life must never be depreciated. Can something like the Holocaust happen again? It is unthinkable but the unthinkable has happened once. We must leave this day of commemoration with that thought. We should resolve ourselves to prevent the Holocaust from ever being remembered as simply a dark moment in history. We should know better. We have seen again in more recent history, the depths to which the souls of man can plunge during times of war. And we've seen again in recent times how those in power can rationalize and justify even the most brutal forms of political change. We must vow never to forget the force of evil which engineered the Holocaust and which slaughtered multitudes of innocent Jews and others. We are charged with the responsibility of making sure that this dreadful force of evil never rears its head again. That is why we must always remember: "For the dead and the living, we must bear witness."

THE 375TH ANNIVERSARY OF HAMPTON, VA, FIRST FROM THE SEA, FIRST TO THE STARS

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, this summer the citizens of Hampton, VA, will celebrate the 375th anniversary of that community's founding.

On July 9, 1610, colonists from Jamestown formally established the city of Hampton, creating what is today the oldest continuous English-speaking settlement in America.

Throughout its life, both before its formal founding and since, Hampton has played numerous important and historic roles.

In 1609, it was the site of America's first outpost, Fort Monroe.

It was the site of America's first trading company, the first Anglican parish, the first free school, and it was the first community in which an organized effort was made to teach blacks.

Hampton has long been a city vital to our national defense.

It was in this community that the British and Americans first engaged one another in Virginia during the Revolutionary War.

The first planned land battle of the Civil War took place in Hampton.

The Civil War ironclads, the Monitor and the Merrimack, first clashed near Hampton.

President Theodore Roosevelt's great white fleet called Hampton its home port, and today Hampton is the testing ground for the Navy's modern day submarines, and headquarters for the Army's Training and Doctrine Command and the Air Force's Tactical Aviation Command.

Throughout much of its life, Hampton has been referred to as first from the sea, because of the landing in 1607 of the ship Godspeed, at what would later become Hampton and because Hampton served as the headquarters to the first Virginia Navy and the first shipyard in America.

But Hampton was also the first to the stars, by being the first home for the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics, now known as NASA, home to the first seven Mercury astronauts and the central training site for all subsequent astronauts, including the Apollo crew members who walked on the Moon, and today's space shuttle astronauts.

To commemorate the city's 375th anniversary, Hampton's citizens are planning numerous events including a visit by the Godspeed during its reenactment voyage.

This is indeed a momentous occasion for the people of Hampton and for all Americans as well.

The Senator from Virginia and others extend to these citizens our best wishes.

May the next 375 years be as rich and glorious as the last 375 for Hampton, VA, "first from the sea, first to the stars."

SOUTH CAROLINA LAW DAY SPEECH BY THE HONORABLE ALEXANDER M. SANDERS, JR., CHIEF JUDGE OF THE SOUTH CAROLINA COURT OF APPEALS

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, each year the South Carolina School of Law holds its annual law day banquet in Columbia, SC. This event is attended by students, alumni, members of the State and Federal judiciaries, and other distinguished practitioners of law. This year one of the keynote speakers was the Honorable Alexander M. Sanders, Jr., chief judge of the South Carolina Court of Appeals. Judge Sanders is a former State representative and State senator and has held a number of other public positions in the State.

Unfortunately, I was out of the country with majority leader BOB DOLE and other Senators for official defense discussions with our NATO allies when this event took place.

I have read a copy of Judge Sanders' remarks and was greatly impressed by the inspirational nature of his speech. I thought my colleagues might enjoy reading his address, since he has, in a very short time, distinguished himself as a very able and dedicated judge with great insight.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Judge Sanders' speech be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SOUTH CAROLINA LAW DAY—SPEECH BY CHIEF JUDGE SANDERS

Thank you, Harry. All things considered, I believe that was the worst introduction I ever got since Marion Gressette introduced me to the Senate. Dean Harry McKinley Lightsey. My classmate. LLB, JD, Phi Beta Kappa. Aspirant to the presidency of Clemson College, emeritus. We're proud of him. Doctor Harry McKinley Lightsey. Doctor of veterinary medicine. The only law school dean in America qualified to give rabies shots. We're proud of him.

Speaking of Phi Beta Kappa, did you see where the Wofford Chapter just made Chief Justice Littlejohn and Bill Rone honorary members? It was an unprecedented departure from tradition. The first time intellect has ever been recognized on an honorary basis. We're proud of them. Bill Rone is the editor of the State newspaper. His counterpart Kent Krell, the editor of the record, said Phi Beta Kappa made them members as part of an affirmative action program. Of course, I don't subscribe to that as to our distinguished chief justice. He really is smart, not just honorary smart. Still, you have to wonder. What do you suppose, they'll do for Woody Brooks. After all, he said he was smarter than the chief justice. What have they got against him.

I myself was recently honored by a visit from another distinguished member of our Supreme Court. It was just after I had written another opinion with a poem in it. It was a personal visit, so his name will remain anonymous. I'll call him Justice A. Although, his real first initial is B. "DON'T EVER DO THAT AGAIN." He suggested. And I agreed not to ever do it again. Put a poem in an opinion. I have too much respect for the poetic art form. To see it quashed. Of course, when I said I wouldn't ever do it again, I wasn't under oath.

Senator Baker, Mr. Chief Justice, distinguished justices of the Supreme Court, my colleagues on the court of appeals, President Holderman—a great leader of a great institution, Dean Lightsey D.V.M., distinguished faculty and students of the law school, Mrs. Thurmond, ladies and gentlemen.

I am seriously honored to be your substitute speaker of this evening, chosen when F. Lee Bailey couldn't come. When Strom Thurmond couldn't come. When Floyd Spence couldn't come. When John Jenerette couldn't come.

I was reading yesterday an article recently published in Trial Magazine by Judge Lawrence Grey, of the Ohio Court of Appeals. The title of the article is "Intermediate Court Creativity." When I read that title I thought to myself "intermediate court creativity". A paradox, a classic oxmoron, a self contradicting phase. An intermediate court, is of course a court of limited authority. Judicial creativity, and creativity, by definition expands the circle of human knowledge and experience. It cannot be intermediate, which means between limits. But then I was reminded of Goethe's maxim: "It is by working within limits that the true master reveals himself." So I thought that I would briefly share with you this evening a few thoughts along these lines.

The judges of the S.C. Court of Appeals are, of course, required to follow the decisions of both the United States Supreme Court and the South Carolina Supreme Court. Let me first assure you, that the judges of the S.C. Court of Appeals are well aware of the limits within which we operate. But, at the same time, let me also say as Professor Leflar has observed, "judges on an intermediate court are bound, but not gagged, by the supreme courts. In this regard, at least, we can be as creative as our minds allow us to be. As creative as we are moved to by the compelling ideas lawyers bring before our court.

Regrettably, much of what we do is dreadfully repetitious. Many cases are routine. To the parties, however, and to their lawyers, each is unique, and each is entitled to careful attention. The backlog in South Carolina the appellate courts is not due to the time judges spend on the precedent-setting case, but rather on the tedious but necessary time spent on the routine cases.

Lawyers should remember, however, that we did not become judges for the tedium, but for the excitement, for the enthusiasm that comes from dealing with important legal questions.

While we are the court of last resort for the routine case, we know that the important case may be only passing through us on its way up. That is the most important limit. Nonetheless, while we may not have the final say in such a case, we have the opportunity to write the most persuasive commentary on it. When a party on appeal asks the court to look at a new rule, or to view an old rule in a new light, we have the opportunity to write an opinion so well thought out, so persuasive, so analytically sound that supreme court review can be almost obviated, reduced to a procedural ritual. The limits on creativity of intermediate appellate judges lie not in the cases or the higher courts, but only in our capacities to think.

Do not confuse what I am saying with the age-old debate on judicial activism versus judicial restraint, because each in its own way is a substitute for judicial thinking. A judge who extols the virtues of judicial restraint may be so dedicated to precedents that he does not contribute. He presumes that judges who preceded him must have known more than he about what the law is and what it ought to be. Since such a judge is so afraid to think. His presumption about himself may be well deserved.

The activist judge has it easy: He not only does not have to read the cases: He does not have to think at all. He already knows the answer and can fashion an opinion to fit it. If his research then is not helpful in achieving his preordained result, he can always rely on Holmes's famous quote: "It is revolting to have no better reason for a rule of law than that so it was laid down in the time of Henry IV."

Judicial activism and judicial conservatism are only reverse sides of the same coin, and both result in a flip-of-the-coin type of justice. I know of no good judge who would not be offended were either appellation attached to him because good judges realize the need for analysis in each case—the need to reaffirm good old ideas and the need to reject ideas that have outlived their usefulness.

Consider, for example, the right to jury trial and illegitimacy. Two legal concepts that have their roots in the middle ages. Even though the necessity or utility of jury trials has been questioned regularly, jury trials are still highly regarded as important to the contemporary legal process. Illegitimacy, on the other hand, is on the way out. The supreme court has ruled repeatedly that there is no rational basis or state interest to be protected by distinguishing children this way.

We accept the concept of trial by jury because it still works, and we reject the concept of illigitimacy because it does not. The infusion of ordinary people into the judicial system as the ultimate arbitrators of fact is still effective in achieving just results. On the other hand, only under primogeniture must a society have illegitimacy, a system for determining which child is first born. Having done away with primogeniture. The idea of illegitimacy is withering away.

For a judge, the "why" of a case is what is important. Holmes was hardly rejecting all rules laid down in the time of Henry IV: he was writing about the reasons for rules. Following a rule because it is old is "revolting," but no more revolting in my opinion than rejecting it because it is old. Today's judge must know why judges in Henry IV's time laid it down, and what interest of society was being protected. Only then can he or she decide if it is still applicable—if society still wishes that interest to be protected.

Perhaps I am being too esoteric here, but unless a rule is understood in terms of its cultural and historical context, one cannot understand the value, or perhaps the danger, of the rule. Consider the common law defenses of lack of privity for products liability, charitable and sovereign immunity, and contributory negligence. These concepts were perfected in the nineteenth century. The age of the robber barons, when the goal of America was to accumulate wealth and power. These rules were, for their time, good and useful. They permitted the concentration of capital and heavy investment and reinvestment in capital goods in both the public and private sectors and the rapid industrialization of the United States. To be sure, many injuries went uncompensated, and many people were left cruelly destitute, but such were the values of the times.

But times change. Novelists like Upton Sinclair portrayed inequities of the system. Sociology was only in its infancy when "lawyer" Brandeis filed his famous brief, and "Judge" Cordozo wrote his famous opinions that products do injure the ultimate consumer even though there is no privity. The ex contractu ideas of the nineteenth century were supplanted by the ex delicto ideas of the twentieth.

Ideas are compelling. There may be no force like that of an idea whose time has come, but some ideas are timeless. In 100 A.D., Pliny the Younger was appointed governor of Bithynia in Asia Minor by the Emperor Trajan. Pliny regularly wrote to Trajan, and in one letter he asked how to react to an anonymous accusation that someone was a Christian. Trajan wrote, "anonymous informations ought not to be received in any sort of prosecution. It is introducing a very dangerous precedent, and is quite foreign to the spirit of our age."

And almost exactly 1,900 years later the S.C. court of appeals—embracing the principle of the Emperor Trajan passed down to us by Pling and John Locke and Thomas Jefferson—wrote "the right of an accused to be confronted by a witness against him is perhaps the most important right given to innocent people. It is so important that it must be also given to those who may be guilty."

How should the judge who wrote the opinion in which these words appear be viewed? Is he a bleeding heart liberal more concerned about the rights of a criminal than the rights of society. Or is he a reactionary conservative relying on a principle that was already centuries old when the middle ages began.

I submit that from the judicial perspective, the terms liberal and conservative—judicial activism and judicial restraint—should be meaningless.

Good judges want just results, and just as Potter Stewart knew obscenity when he saw it, good judges know injustice when they see it. They will preserve those rules that accomplish just results, no matter how ancient. A judge can be as creative in maintaining a good old rule in the face of adverse public opinion. As in seeking new rules for new problems.

Judicial creativity is the continuing juxtaposition of old and new ideas alongside old and new values. This is critical in understanding the appellate process. Judges are less like artists and more like museum curators. Some of the finest works of human creativity were produced during the Ming dynasty. But the Ming dynasty also produced many mediocre artifacts. Likewise, today many works of art are produced, but only some have value. Good judges, like good curators, preserve the best traditions, but also like curators, are open to the newest creativity in our society. They judge not that it is Ming, or postmodern, but only that it is good or bad.

What do these comparisons have to do with the practicing lawyer? They give insight into judicial creativity: They point the way for the practicing lawyer's participation in it.

Having a common-law system, judges tend to be content to follow an old rule and loath to write a new one, so how are new rules established? As I said before, "ideas are compelling." Let me rephrase that. "Ideas are so compelling, even judges can be moved." An effective lawyer moves a judge by talking about the ideas behind a rule. Every rule of law is a "good" one because it promotes and protects some value or principle, and if it is to be judged, it must be judged on what it promotes. Racial equality has been the official policy of the United States since 1864, and the "separate-but-equal" ruling of Plessy v. Freguson was in its way an attempt to promote equality. But that rule had a flaw—it was based on the idea of separateness. Brown v. Board of Education did not strike down the principle of equality, but the idea of separateness.

So in conclusion, let me leave you as lawyers, or soon to be lawyers, with this thought for law day 1985. The life of the law is by no means exclusively entrusted to the guardianship of us judges. It is your role and your responsibility to attend to its well being throughout the balance of this century and the next.

When a lawyer writes a routine brief, a court writes a routine opinion.

Sometime ago I wrote in the transcript that the second worst invention of the 20th century was the word processor. The first worst being the hydrogen bomb and the third, tassel loafers.

In this age of microchips. I fear we are approaching the day where a lawyer enters "arguments of 119-B(1)" on his word processor and files his brief. Perhaps this day will not come. But, if it does you can be sure that a court will then enter "opinion 119-B(1)" on its word processor, so I emplore you this evening. Put life in your logic and fire in your words.

When I speak of fire, I am not speaking of inflamed rhetoric or passionate pleas, but the fire of ideas. If I am to be a creative judge, to see my way out of Socrates' dark cave, you must provide Plato's leaping spark to give me light. See what I mean.

THERESE KNECHT DOZIER, RECIPIENT OF THE NATIONAL TEACHER OF THE YEAR AWARD

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I would like to take this opportunity to extend recognition to my constituent Therese Knecht Dozier, who has distinguished herself as "1985 National Teacher of the Year." I was pleased to attend ceremonies at the White House on April 18, at which Mrs. Dozier was presented the award by President Reagan. Therese Dozier has continually devoted herself to academic excellence both as a student and as a teacher. She is greatly loved by her students, who recognize her skill and dedication, and by the parents in the community. In becoming a teacher, she fulfulled a lifelong ambition to nourish, guide, and encourage young people. Through her unselfish and untiring devotion to her students, and through her personal standards of excellence, she has set a fine example for other teachers and prospective educators throughout the United States.

Born in Vietnam of a Vietnamese mother and German father, sold to a Chinese businessman, transferred to a French orphanage, and eventually adopted by U.S. Military Adviser Lawrence Knecht and his wife, Theresa Dozier has survived, seized on, and made the most of every opportunity that has come her way. She has devoted herself to a career in educating, nourishing, and enriching the lives of young people. Recognition of Mrs. Dozier as National Teacher of the Year underscores the valuable contributions Asian-Americans are making to our Nation in fulfillment of the American dream. South Carolinians and all Americans can be justifiably proud of this excellent teacher.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that additional biographical information on Mrs. Therese Knecht Dozier be included in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD following my statement, in order that my colleagues may be informed of the background and accomplishments of this remarkable young woman.

There being no objection, the biographical information was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BIOGRAPHICAL INFORMATION: THERESE KNECHT DOZIER

1985 National Teacher of the Year

The sequence of events that brought Therese Knecht Dozier from a South Vietnam orphanage to a South Carolina classroom and recognition as 1985 National Teacher of the Year reads like a wildly improbable novel, one that is also a glowing and inspirational chronicle of the indomitability of the human spirit against almost unsurmountable and, at times, cruel odds.

Terry Dozier was born on or about June 17, 1952 (she is not sure of the exact date) in war-torn Saigon. Her mother was a Vietnamese woman, her father a former colonel in Hitler's Waffen SS who had fled Germany during the closing days of World War II and joined the French Foreign Legion. He eventually wound up in what was then known as French Indochina, where Vietnamese nationalists were threatening to end French colonial rule. There he met and married Terry's mother, who died 20 months later, shortly after giving birth to Terry's younger brother, Timothee.

Unable to care for the two children, their Legionnaire father sold them to a Chinese businessman, who planned to sell them to a childless Chinese couple. When the French authorities discovered this and began searching for the children, the Chinese businessman, fearing arrest, gave Terry and her brother to an old Chinese woman living on a sampan in the Saigon River. The authorities found the two children there, suffering from malnutrition, and turned them over to a French orphanage. Meanwhile, their father was believed to have been killed in the crucial defeat of the French at Dien Bien Phu in 1954, which brought about the division of Vietnam at Geneva that year.

At the time, Lawrence Knecht, a U.S. Army warrant officer, was stationed in Saigon as a military advisor to the French. For years he and his wife, Anne, had tried unsuccessfully to adopt a child in the States. At the French orphanage, they were immediately captivated by Terry's brother and decided to adopt him. When told by the orphanage chaplain that the 15-month-old boy had a two-and-half-year-old sister, the couple agreed to take her, too, although, as Knecht recalls, "Terry was so undernourished that she was all skin and bones and her hair was falling out." Terry and her brother are believed to be the first Vietnamese children to be adopted by an American couple.

Upon completing his assignment in Vietnam in 1955, Knecht was sent back to the States, and the family spent two years in Atlanta, Georgia, where Terry went to kindergarten. Then Knecht was reassigned to Heidelberg, Germany, where his daughter was a first grader in a school for dependents of American soldiers. It was in Germany that Knecht had a strange experience touching on Terry's past. While driving on the autobahn one day, he picked up a hitchhiker, who turned out to be vaguely familiar. Knecht suddenly realized that the hitchhiker was a former member of the French Foreign Legion he had known slightly in Saigon. The hitchhiker confirmed that Terry's natural father had been killed in Dien Bien Phu.

When Knecht retired from the army in 1959, the family settled in Punta Gorda, Fla., where Terry attended and graduated from Charlotte High School as valedictorian. She has wanted to teach as long as she could remember, even though people discouraged her, citing poor salaries and the fact that she was too "bright" to waste her talents teaching. The orphanage chaplain had termed her "the smartest child I've ever seen," and her adoptive father said she was bright enough to be anything, "even a brain surgeon."

Nonetheless, while in high school, Terry wrote an essay on "Why I Want to Become A Teacher," which won a $2,000 state Jaycees teaching scholarship.

She attributes her interest in history largely to her exotic, multi-national heritage and the fact that her own life was directly influenced by historic events. "However," she says, "my interest was also the result of several dynamic high school teachers and the emphasis my parents placed on the significance of historical events."

She therefore majored in both education and history at the University of Florida, from which she graduated in 1974 with a straight A average as the university's "Outstanding Four-Year Scholar." One week after graduation, she married Mark Dozier, a student with whom she had worked several years before in a Gainesville book store, and began her career in education teaching social studies at a middle school in Gainesville, Fla. "Working with the underprivileged low-achievers there reconfirmed the decision I had made years before to teach," she recalls. At the same time, she pursued the requirements for the master's degree in social studies she eventually earned from the University of Florida.

In 1976, Mark's work as a sales representative in the travel field took them to Miami, where she taught math to extremely disadvantaged children at an inner-city middle school. It was a rough school, and the first advice the young teacher got was to lock herself in her room, although she says she never had any serious disciplinary problems. "Again, the economic plight and low educational caliber of the students made me realize how truly fortunate I was and how desperately good teachers are needed to stimulate and encourage children," Terry says.

A year later, Mark was about to be promoted and transferred to New York City—a move that neither Mark nor Terry were enthusiastic about. "Being a teacher is very important to me," she says. "But with my southern accent I worried about how I would be accepted in New York."

So the couple selected Columbia, S.C., which they had visited on one earlier occasion because it was exactly halfway between their hometowns of Memphis, Tenn., and Punta Gorda, Fla. Neither had any job prospects in Columbia, but Terry applied for interviews with several school districts in the area. Ironically, the only district that refused to interview her was the one containing Irmo High School. But a vacancy suddenly developed when another teacher hired failed to qualify completely, and Terry was suddenly called in for an interview, hired, and assigned to Irmo, where she has been teaching since 1977.

During the first two years there, she taught world geography, civics, U.S. history, and values clarification; since 1979, she has concentrated on world history, the subject in which she feels she can make the greatest contribution.

She has earned the respect and admiration of students and parents alike for the innovative ways she has developed for bringing history alive through various classroom activities. "I try to bring history to life for my students," she says. "Stimulating a student's mind and inspiring students to learn are a teacher's most difficult task."

The ingenious techniques she has devised for stimulating students include an annual "Medieval Fair," where students assumed the roles of royalty, barbarians, minstrels, jugglers, and jesters; a board game, Imperialism, where students and classes, assuming the roles of European powers, compete with each other in trying to amass the largest colonial empires; and an oral history project involving the entire community.

Mrs. Dozier is known as a demanding teacher who has high expectations of her students. She feels that her primary goal as a teacher is to help her students recognize their potential and develop their abilities to their fullest extent. "To do this, I feel it is essential to set high standards of excellence for my students," she explains, "because I have discovered that students will live up to the expectations that are set for them. Therefore, I strive to challenge and stimulate my students while maintaining an unshakable faith in their ability to meet that challenge."

However, she also feels that winning the hearts of students is equally as important as stimulating their minds. "This is accomplished by showing that you care about the students as individuals," she says. "By cultivating and maintaining a good rapport with my students, I nurture an atmosphere of trust."

But, in her view, capturing the hearts of students also means showing concern for them outside the classroom. She feels that teachers must make themselves available to their students, whether it is for extra help with schoolwork or to listen to their personal problems. Also, she feels that teachers must keep in contact with parents of their students, not only when they have problems but when they need to be praised.

Terry Dozier's interests outside the classroom include travel, the theater, reading, sewing, gardening, backpacking, camping and fishing—as well as two that are teacher-related.

One is to be the first teacher in space, and to help her fulfill this goal South Carolina Governor Richard Riley has endorsed her application for the NASA Teacher in Space Project.

To broaden her teaching horizons, she has also applied again for a Fulbright fellowship to China for a summer of study in that country. Last year she was selected as an alternate for this U.S. Department of Education seminar program.

"It has been my education that I prize most as an American citizen," Terry says. "It is the one thing I know I could never have received if I had not been adopted and brought to this country. I try to convey to my students that education can open up the world and the doors of opportunity to them, as it has done for me.

"I have always been very conscious of having been given a chance to make something of myself," she continues. "I want to give that chance to others and to share the excitement of learning that I have always felt. Teaching is my way of repaying a debt."

JEWISH LIFE IN THE SOVIET UNION

Mr. TRIBLE. Mr. President, it is a pleasure to again take part in the 1985 call to conscience in behalf of Soviet Jews.

In the days ahead, free people around the world will commemorate the 40th anniversary of the liberation of Jews from the death camps of the Nazi regime. The Jews' liberation from Auschwitz, Buchenwald, and the other stations of horror that dotted Nazi Germany was a source of hope to the world. It inspired in free men a belief that good might yet triumph over evil.

But this will not be accomplished without a struggle. The freedom to worship God cannot be secured by good intentions alone. Rather, it demands that free people sustain their profound faith in God, and that they work tirelessly to ensure for others the same right of religious freedom.

Today, religious freedom is under assault in the Soviet Union, and the Jews are the chosen victims of Soviet oppression. As always, it is difficult to practice any religion in the U.S.S.R. As always, it is particularly difficult to be a Jew in that country.

The Soviet regime refuses to allow the widespread practice of Judaism. It closes synagogues at will and confiscates prayer books. It harasses and imprisons prominent Jewish leaders.

Is it any wonder that the pleadings of Jews who wish to leave the Soviet Union have grown? During the past several years, hundreds of thousands of Jews have risked persecution and villification to apply for permission to emigrate. The vast majority have been refused. They remain imprisoned in a land where their faith is oppressed, with little hope of leaving for lands in which religion can flourish.

Earlier this year, a fellow Virginian informed me of one such family in the Soviet Union—the Uspenskiis. The Uspenskiis applied to leave the Soviet Union in July 1979. Prior to that, they had visited the West a number of times, and were accomplished academicians in the U.S.S.R.

Not surprisingly, their request to emigrate was refused. They were excluded from further scientific and academic travels, and their articles were no longer published by the Soviet press. By December 1981, Mrs. Uspenskii had been fired from her job, and her husband demoted from his.

Theirs is the typical story of Jewish life in the Soviet Union. Overt expressions of religious faith are treated harshly by the Soviet regime. The government has stepped up its oppression of Jews in recent years. At the same time, it refuses to allow Jews to leave the U.S.S.R.

Mr. President, we are their hope. We who enjoy religious freedom are obliged to try to extend it to others, especially those for whom the weight of Soviet oppression grows heavier every day. We must continue to affirm our commitment to the Soviet Jews, to their freedom and their faith, and I urge my colleagues to continue to take part in the call to conscience.

OPPOSITION TO APARTHEID IN SOUTH AFRICA

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, yesterday, acting for himself, Senator MATHIAS, myself and Senator LUGAR introduced a bill to express strong U.S. opposition to apartheid in South Africa and to encourage the South African Government to dismantle the apartheid system.

Apartheid in South Africa is one of the most important, but also one of the most complex and emotion-laden, foreign policy problems which we face today. It is, therefore, an issue on which we must be particularly thoughtful in what we do and particularly realistic in what we hope to accomplish.

OUR NATIONAL GOALS

Almost all of us agree on what our basic goals in South Africa should be. Most important, we insist on a speedy end to the apartheid system. Apartheid is immoral. It violates the basic precepts of the Judeo-Christian ethic and the basic principles on which this and other democratic nations are founded. There is no excuse for perpetuating apartheid—it serves no one's long-term interests. Apartheid must go. Apartheid will go.

But it is also in everyone's interest to see that apartheid's demise, while speedy, is nonviolent. It will not serve black interests, any more than white, if apartheid is swept away in a torrent of hatred and bloodshed. Our aim is not to force the white South African authorities to the wall—it is to get them to change their policies and let blacks into the system.

Finally, while the removal of apartheid must be at the heart of our policies in South Africa, it would be naive and dangerous to ignore the reality that we also have other goals in that country and region. We want to minimize the presence and influence of the Soviets and their surrogates in southern Africa. We want to see an end to regional conflict, with normalized relations between South Africa and its neighbors, especially Angola and Mozambique. We want to see true Namibian independence. We cannot compromise our stand against apartheid in pursuit of these other goals, but neither can we ignore these other factors as part of the total picture in that important region of the world.

ACHIEVING OUR GOALS

While there is general agreement on these goals, however, there is great disagreement on how best to achieve them. And, I want to say, there is sincere disagreement on how to achieve them. For our part, we think our bill, which contains a four-part approach, is the one which offers the best chance for quick, peaceful, and comprehensive change in South Africa.

CONDEMNS APARTHEID

First, we condemn apartheid, loudly and clearly. There can be no waffling on this point. In our bill, there is none.

CONSTRUCTIVE ACTIONS

Second, we have tried to emphasize the constructive actions which we as Americans can take to reach our goals—actions which can make South Africa a little better place immediately and can speed the day when the worst features of its governmental system can be swept away entirely.

The bill asserts what I strongly believe—that, by and large, the American business presence in South Africa has been and is a constructive force for economic progress, social reform, and even political liberalization. In my view there is no question that South African blacks are better off today in virtually all spheres than they would be if the American business presence were eliminated. In my view, the worst thing we could do now would be to force disinvestment, either directly or indirectly. Our bill, in sum, aims at encouraging the continued presence of American business as long as it continues to be a force for good in the country.

The bill also increases the positive impact of our Government's presence in South Africa. It earmarks additional funds within AID's budget for scholarships for blacks and for human-rights-related projects. It directs that the administration, to the extent feasible, procure the goods and services it needs to support our presence in South Africa from black and other non-white-owned firms. It also encourages both OPIC and Exim to increase their involvement with and support for such companies. All of these steps are intended as a concrete and direct manifestation of our wish to see South Africa become a land of more equitable opportunity and political freedom.

SULLIVAN PRINCIPLES

Third, our bill strongly encourages the continued and expanded adherence to the so-called Sullivan principles by American firms in South Africa. I would repeat two things I said earlier: First, we think the American business presence is by and large a positive force in South Africa, which we want to encourage; but second, we want to encourage it only so long as it is that positive force. We do not favor an American business presence in South Africa if its only purpose is making money. Our bill, we are convinced, encourages the right kind of business presence.

It authorizes and requires the Secretary of State to establish procedures by which it can be determined which firms are in compliance with the Sullivan principles and which are not. Those companies not in compliance would thereafter be denied the right to expand their investment in South Africa and would not be able to call upon the intervention of our Government in other commercial disputes. These features are not intended to and should not scare companies in compliance with Sullivan, but we believe they will be a powerful incentive for noncomplying companies to change their ways.

REPORTING REQUIREMENT

Finally, our bill directs the President to report to the Congress periodically—beginning within a reasonable timeframe—whether South Africa is making significant progress in dismantling the apartheid system. In setting our timeframe, we have in mind Bishop Tutu's own comments and ideas about the best way to proceed. Should the President in any one of these periodic reports, determine that the South African Government has not made such progress, he is directed to recommend from among appropriate sanctions, which we have listed. The Congress would deal with the President's reports and recommendations under expedited procedures.

We hope we won't reach that stage. We hope the South African authorities, though, will understand from this approach that our patience has just about worn out. We want—we insist upon—some real progress. We insist upon it soon. And if we don't see it soon, we will act.

CONCLUSION

Much of the credit for this bill must go to my two original cosponsors. The distinguished chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee was the major architect of the overall package. He is determined to move ahead with good legislation in this area, as demonstrated by the excellent hearings which he has already begun. The senior Senator from Maryland has also made a tremendous contribution to the shape of this bill. Indeed, its important final sections were largely derived from the excellent legislation which he introduced, and which the Foreign Relations Committee overwhelmingly approved, several weeks ago.

I would also note that, press accounts notwithstanding, this is not an administration bill. We would, of course, welcome the administration's support for the bill—we hope we will get that support—but this is a bill undertaken at our initiative, on which the administration—to the best of my knowledge—has not yet spoken.

We do hope that all of you, though, our colleagues here in the Senate, will speak out now, and speak out favorably, on this bill. We think this is a strong, constructive, realistic approach to this very important problem. We think if offers the best chance of achieving the goals we all share. We think it ought to be passed by the Congress and signed by the President. And we think it ought to be soon.

FIRST BUDGET RESOLUTION

Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, the Senate-administration deficit reduction plan is legislation designed to deal with America's greatest domestic problem—uncontrolled Federal spending.

This is not a perfect package. In my judgment, there are areas that should have come in for greater reductions, such as agricultural subsidies, and areas in which the package cuts too much, like Amtrak. But the bottom line is simple—after months of difficult negotiations, compromises and general agony, we have before us a package that accomplishes the fiscal restraint that all of us know is critical. I think this package deserves the support of the Senate, if not in every particular, certainly as an overall blueprint to reduce Federal spending.

We find America right now in a "good news-bad news" situation. The good news is that the United States is on the move again. Our economy has made a remarkable turnaround that is the envy of the world. The strong recovery has not only created millions of jobs for Americans, but has been the engine of growth for the free and Third World. We can be justly proud of these accomplishments and especially of the renewal of the American spirit.

Once again we are a confident people who face the future with vigor. A bright future awaits us and our children if we have the courage to make the decisions necessary to meet the challenge of the times. That is the good news.

The bad news is that if we continue to ignore Federal spending, we run the risk that interest rates will climb, housing and construction will decline, production of exports will diminish, creating even worse balance of payment problems and heavy unemployment in trade-related industries, farmers will continue to lose their farms, and the growth of our standard of living will slow. Further, the Government will continue to pay larger and larger amounts of money just on interest on the national debt. In fact, current projected budgets deficits will double our $1.5 trillion national debt in 5 years, resulting in annual interest payments which will approach the current defense budget.

To give you another sense of the problem, this year the individual share of the national debt for every man, woman, and child in the United States is $6,400. Unless action is taken now, that share will rise to $11,200 by 1990.

In short, we must sacrifice today for a better tomorrow. We must ensure that our children, and our children's children, have the same chance of success that you and I have had. Those of us who reached maturity in the postwar period have been the beneficiaries of the greatest period of economic prosperity in the history of the world. It would be the height of arrogance for us to pass on to the next generation not the gift of opportunity which we have enjoyed but instead the burden of debt caused by our own selfishness. Yet that is exactly what we are on the verge of doing.

Fortunately, however, we still have time to right this wrong. We still have time to lay a strong foundation for economic growth that will benefit our children. But we must act now. The legislation before us this week gives us that opportunity to match our actions with our rhetoric and act to provide that foundation.

We all are part of the budget problem. For too many years, just about every American has come to expect a benefit in some way, shape or manner from the Federal Government.

Uncle Sam helps us buy our houses, educate our children, build our roads, pay our hospital bills, provide us cheap food and utilities, set up new businesses, have nice vacations—the list goes on and on. And everybody, down to the biggest dyed-in-the-wool fiscal conservative, happily assumes they are his or her God-given rights on Earth.

In short, we have a deficit problem not just because we spend too much on defense or welfare, but because we expect too much from Government.

I will be voting to cut or terminate programs with this bill that I have enthusiastically supported in the past. But I know of no other way to reduce the deficit. The easy cuts have been done.

Some people have argued that we could avoid all this pain, or some of it, by simply raising taxes. After all, say these big-spenders, Roth-Kemp was nothing more than a giveaway, and it's time to regain our fiscal senses.

For the life of me, I cannot understand how these politicians and businessmen continue to make that argument. Taxes as a percentage of GNP are at their historical levels. The four tax increases that Congress has passed since 1981 have literally canceled out the revenue reductions contained in Roth-Kemp. We just had a national election where the central issue was whether to raise taxes—and 49 States emphatically said no.

As far as I am concerned, the sooner we forget taxes as an option, the sooner we will make progress on the real villain—excessive spending. The authors of this package are to be commended for recognizing the truth, and not recommending any general tax increase.

However, there are those in this Chamber and around the country who are hoping that this package falls flat on its face, because they know that will give them a great opportunity to jump in with their warmed-over and completely discredited plans to raise the taxes of the working people of this country. That is one big reason why this package, or something very similar must pass this body.

Mr. President, as I travel around Delaware, one thing has become very clear to me. Delawareans are willing to sacrifice, as long as they believe the pain is being spread evenly. Whatever else Congress does in dealing with the budget, it must, to the greatest extent possible, be fair. This package meets that fairness test—it hits almost everybody. There are no sacred cows in this plan. Social Security is included, against the wishes of the President. Defense is cut substantially. Almost every special interest has been hit in some way. Whatever faults this proposal has, it is comprehensive.

Mr. President, it is no fun having to consider this deficit reduction package. Nobody likes to say "No."

But it is our inability to say "No" in the past that has gotten us into the fix we are in today. The vast majority in this country know this, and they want action and leadership from this body. Quite frankly, if we continue to ignore the deficit, we are going to look like fools, and the public will remember our inaction at the ballot box—as well they should.

In the last few weeks, I have had a parade of people at my office door with the same message—do something about the budget deficit, but cut somebody else.

This year, that strategy won't work. Tough, painful cuts like those called for in this resolution must be made across the spectrum of programs. It is the only way to avoid very serious problems later.

To create long-term growth, it is essential to establish those policies that will enable the United States to compete in the world economy. That, in turn, depends upon regaining control of Federal spending so that the United States has the resources to develop the world's most modern industrial facilities. The lesson of Chrysler and United States Steel is that obsolete plants cannot compete with foreign producers utilizing the latest technology. It is the failure to remain competitive that has caused the decline of Europe and the loss of millions of jobs.

We cannot let that happen here. If we sacrifice a little today, we will have a better tomorrow. What American, what mother or father, what grandmother or grandfather, is not willing to give a little to help their children, or children's children, face a brighter future?

By tightening our belts, we can guarantee for our young people the kind of future that we found not that long ago. America is a great country. Our economy is the envy of the world. Because of our strong economy, we have become the place where the world puts its money. And despite what the "gloom and doomers" tell you, the future of this country is brighter now than in a long, long time. If we can successfully deal with the challenge of the deficit, the prosperity that we now enjoy will not be a passing fancy. It will last, and our children can look forward to the progress and the happiness that this generation has come to take for granted.

I urge that the Senate look favorably upon the bulk of this package.

A SPECIAL EVENING FOR A GREAT AMERICAN: RECEPTION AND DINNER TO BUILD THE STROM THURMOND CENTER AT CLEMSON UNIVERSITY

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, on Wednesday evening, April 24, this Senator had the privilege of serving as toastmaster at a dinner honoring one of the truly great Members in the distinguished history of this body. At the Capitol Hilton Hotel in downtown Washington, hundreds of friends, neighbors, and colleagues gathered yesterday to salute Senator STROM THURMOND and the very worthy educational project named for him at the Senator's alma mater, Clemson University. The planned project is called the Strom Thurmond Center for Excellence in Government and Public Service. In my view, no monument could better exemplify the contributions the senior Senator from South Carolina has made to the people of his State and to this Nation. The Strom Thurmond Center represents the best hope for the future of America, because there is no goal more important than inspiring the youth of this country to become involved in government.

Of course, my good friend, STROM, has dedicated his entire life to public service. As a citizen, soldier, and statesman, Senator THURMOND has spent 60 years striving to make America a better place to live.

First, as an educator, school superintendent, State senator, and circuit judge, then as a decorated World War II veteran, Governor of South Carolina, and for the past 31 years as a U.S. Senator, STROM THURMOND has personified the goals and ideals the center at Clemson University will be designed to promote.

STROM is much more than a Senate colleague. He is a good and trusted friend, a confidante, an adviser, and a distinguished member of the Senate leadership as President pro tempore.

Mr. President, this Senator would like to thank Senator JOE BIDEN, Senator BILL ARMSTRONG, and Clemson University President Dr. Bill L. Atchley for their participation in the program and their fine remarks.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the following materials from Wednesday evening's event be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SPONSORS

The Honorable George Bush, Vice President of the United States.

Senator Robert Dole, the Majority Leader.

Senator Alan K. Simpson, the Majority Whip.

Senator John Chafee, Chairman, Republican Conference.

Senator Thad Cochran, Secretary, Republican Conference.

Senator William Armstrong, Chairman, Republican Policy Committee.

Senator John Heinz, Chairman, Republican Senatorial Committee.

Senator Robert C. Byrd, the Democratic Leader.

Senator Alan Cranston, the Democratic Whip.

Senator Daniel K. Inouye, Secretary, Democratic Conference.

Senator George J. Mitchell, Chairman, Democratic Senatorial Committee.

Senator Ernest F. Hollings, the State of South Carolina.

PRAYER

Gracious God, our Loving Father in Heaven, we honor one of America's great and good men this evening. Held in highest regard by the people of South Carolina and the Nation, respected and admired by his peers in Washington, D.C., cherished in love and affection by his friends and family, Senator Strom Thurmond is worthy of every accolade a people can render to its leaders. We praise You, Lord, for the leadership Your faithful servant has given this Nation and the world. We thank You for the vision of the Strom Thurmond Center, those whose vision it is, and all who make it a reality. Blest is the university on which this campus this Center of Excellence will diffuse its light and life, its history and its hope, as it reflects the integrity, the courage, the goodness, the grace of the man it honors.

We thank You, Father, for the pleasure of each others' company at these tables. May Your love fill this room and bless all who are present. We thank You for good food—the farmers who produced it—the industry which processed it—those who prepare and serve it. May we, who always have more than enough of everything, remember with compassion and generosity, those who never have enough of anything. In His name Who is Love Incarnate. Amen.

THE REV. DR. RICHARD C. HALVERSON,
Chaplain, U.S. Senate.

THE THURMOND CENTER

On October 29, 1981, Senator Thurmond announced his decision to place his public papers and memorabilia at his alma mater, Clemson University.

Because it shares the Senator's belief that service to others is the greatest privilege of democracy and that education should enhance freedom, Clemson University announced that the Senator's historic gift would be the first step in the establishment of the Strom Thurmond Center for Excellence in Government and Public Service. The Center's programs will embody the philosophy and values of Senator Thurmond and will be characterized by his pursuit of excellence and undaunted spirit of civic purpose.

The Center will be the focal point for important programs to serve people—programs in civic education, continuing education, and cultural education. In accordance with the Senator's wishes, it is never to be a monument, but a living institution, for students and scholars of government and public service. Already, major figures in government and foreign policy have appeared at Clemson University, under the auspices of the Thurmond Center.

The Center will provide public service and it will promote public service. It will enhance the cultural life of Clemson University, South Carolina, and the Nation. It will offer the kind of university-based civic education and continuing education that will enable people to put new ideas to work throughout South Carolina and across America for the betterment of their communities, towns, cities, and states. It is based on a view of "practical politics," "good government," and a truly "enlightened citizenry" that the founders of the nation understood firsthand.

An ambitious $25 million project, the Center will consist of a complex of three buildings at the heart of the Clemson campus—an auditorium facility, a continuing education building and the Strom Thurmond Institute.

LETTERS OF PRAISE

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, April 23, 1985.

I am pleased to send greetings to everyone at the dinner in honor of Senator Strom Thurmond and in support of the Strom Thurmond Center for Excellence in Government and Public Service.

You who are working to make that Center a reality deserve every commendation. The support of leaders like Bob Dole and Bob Byrd shows how important this Center is to all Americans, regardless of party.

We all have a stake in good government, and in inspiring the best of our young people to enter political life. The Strom Thurmond Center will help ensure that young Americans who decide on a career in government can acquire the knowledge and wisdom necessary to serve the Nation.

Nancy joins me in wishing all of you a memorable evening.

RONALD REAGAN.

THE VICE PRESIDENT,
Washington, April 24, 1985.

Hon. STROM THURMOND,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR STROM: I regret that I am unable to be with you tonight to help support the Strom Thurmond Center for Excellence in Government and Public Service. However, I am pleased to be among many distinguished sponsors of this fundraising dinner.

Good government, and inspiring the interest of our young people toward public service, is a goal all of us share. The future of America depends on tomorrow's leaders, and the Strom Thurmond Center will help ensure that generations yet to come will have facilities needed to seriously study our government and the field of public service.

Tonight's dinner, and the generous contributions of those in attendance, are strong symbols of the support and commitment the private sector has invested in education and tomorrow's leaders.

Strom, I want to join with your other friends tonight in saluting you for your commitment to these ideals, and to commend Clemson University for its support of the Strom Thurmond Center, a facility destined to be a great source for scholarly achievement and good government.

With warmest regards and best wishes,

GEORGE BUSH.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, DC, April 23, 1985.

DEAR FRIENDS OF SENATOR THURMOND: You have chosen wisely in giving support to the Strom Thurmond Institute at Clemson University. A library to house public and private papers is an honor usually reserved for Presidents, but the building of this Institute will tell future generations of Americans something about a great American whose career has few parallels in modern American history.

Few people ever combined as many successful careers as Strom Thurmond: farmer, teacher and school superintendent, Governor, a decorated Major General, and now President pro tempore of the United States Senate. Others will undoubtedly expand on those achievements.

After graduating from Clemson in 1923, he studied law at night with his father, and then ranked at the top of the list of applicants taking the State Bar Examination. As one who also studied law at a night law school while working during the day, I can understand his dedication to the law. After practice as a private practitioner, a city attorney, and a county attorney, his election as a circuit judge in 1938 began a significant public career, and I have no doubt he would have had a remarkable career in the State courts except for his call to service in 1941. As Chairman of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, Senator Thurmond oversees legislation concerning our Nation's courts and legal system and all nominations of federal judges must pass through his Committee. His accomplishments in enacting truly major legislation are too long to list, but most recently they included a key role in the passage of the Commission on the Bicentennial of the United States Constitution, the Bankruptcy Amendments and Federal Judgeship Act of 1984, and the Comprehensive Crime Control Act of 1984.

The incumbent of my office necessarily works with the Committees on the Judiciary, and I have found Strom Thurmond a good man to turn to for counsel and advice. Supporters and adversaries alike look up to him as a man of rock-hard integrity and basic fairness. I am proud to be his friend. Seven times the people of South Carolina have elected him as their representative in the Congress where he has established a place that ranks him as one of the all time Senate "greats."

Cordially,

WARREN E. BURGER.

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, DC, April 24, 1985.

Hon. ROBERT DOLE,
The Majority Leader, United States Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR BOB: It's with regret that I will not be with you and the many distinguished guests for tonight's very special event honoring our friend Strom and the Strom Thurmond Institute. As former Chairman of the Budget Committee, I have been asked to observe and comment on the President's televised remarks on the budget. Thereafter, I must attend a dinner at the Madison where I am the honoree.

Our senior Senator has reached the stage of folk hero in our native South Carolina. He has served from school teacher to judge to Governor to presidential nominee to United States Senator to President Pro Tem of the United States. In each capacity, he has not only enhanced his own reputation and respect but has brought favor upon the State of South Carolina and this nation.

It is fitting that Strom is dedicating an institution to learning at Clemson University. It is said that those who educate our youth are more to be honored than those who produce them, for while the one renders the gift of life, the other gives the art of living. The Institute is a deserved tribute to our state's most dedicated public servant.

My fondest regards to Strom and Nancy and all the many supporters of the Strom Thurmond Institute.

With kindest regards, I am

Sincerely,

ERNEST F. HOLLINGS.

CONCLUSION

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, our distinguished colleague from South Carolina capped the evening's festivities with an outstanding address. Although his comments were extemporaneous, the Senator from Kansas would like to paraphrase some of Mr. THURMOND'S remarks—the words are fresh in my mind and bear repeating. The Senator stated—quite modestly—that we do not honor a single individual with a dinner, but rather an ideal: That America's future is invested wholly in its youth. Indeed, this commitment to succeeding generations is what the Thurmond Center is all about. For years to come, all political points of view will have the opportunity to converge under one roof on the Clemson campus, where eager minds will advance the freedom of expression that has made this country great. In fact, the good feelings and bipartisan nature of Mr. THURMOND's evening represented the very essence of Clemson's ambitious project, and tells us that the spirit of America is alive and well in the Palmetto State.

Mr. President, this Senator can only thank the good people of South Carolina for sending their outstanding citizen-politician-statesman to Washington.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Saunders, one of his secretaries.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session, the Acting President pro tempore laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting a nomination which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and the withdrawal of a nomination.

(The nominations received today are printed at the end of the Senate proceedings.)

MESSAGES FROM THE HOUSE

At 11:35 a.m., a message from the House of Representatives, delivered by Mr. Berry, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House disagrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 1869) to repeal the contemporaneous recordkeeping requirements added by the Tax Reform Act of 1984, and for other purposes; it agrees to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI, Mr. GIBBONS, Mr. PICKLE, Mr. RANGEL, Mr. STARK, Mr. DUNCAN, Mr. ARCHER, and Mr. VANDER JAGT as managers of the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House has agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 33) designating the week of April 29 through May 5, 1985, as "National Child Safety Week."

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The following petitions and memorials were laid before the Senate and were referred or ordered to lie on the table as indicated:

POM-174. A concurrent resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Kansas; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

"SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION No. 1601

"Whereas, the Kansas economy greatly depends on the health and stability of the agricultural sector, the strength of which requires a competitive and expanding presence in international grain markets; and

"Whereas, Existing federal grain grade standards fail to reflect to foreign buyers important characteristics that affect the ultimate value of grain in processing and consumption; and

"Whereas, Grain grade standards only have value to the extent they provide useful marketing information and economic incentives for quality throughout the export system: Now, therefore,

"Be it resolved by the Senate of the State of Kansas, the House of Representatives concurring therein: That the United States Department of Agriculture change current grades for grain to:

"(a) Establish separate factors for measuring broken grain and foreign material;

"(b) eliminate moisture as a grade determining factor in all grains, with moisture to be recorded on the certificate; and

"(c) include factors that have economic value as related to the end use properties and the products to be made from that grain; and

"Be it further resolved: That the United States Department of Agriculture should continue research and education efforts to standardize measurement techniques and grain grade to provide further uniformity among all major exporting and importing countries and should expedite revision of grade standards; and

"Be it further resolved: That the Secretary of State be directed to send enrolled copies of this resolution to the President of the United States, the Secretary of State of the United States, the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States, the Administrator of the United States Grain Inspection Service, the President of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives, the Chairperson of the Committee on Agriculture of the United States Senate, the Chairperson of the Committee on Agriculture of the United States House of Representatives and each member of the Kansas Congressional Delegation."

POM-175. Joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Montana; to the Committee on the Budget.

"SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION No. 15

"Whereas, the Office of Management and Budget has projected a federal deficit of $210 billion in fiscal year 1985; and

"Whereas, the Office of Management and Budget has forecast a long-term federal budget deficit of $229 billion by fiscal year 1989; and

"Whereas, the Congressional Budget Office has projected a federal budget deficit of $263 billion by fiscal year 1989; and

"Whereas, in November 1983, the debt ceiling was raised by $101 billion to $1.490 trillion in order to allow the Department of the Treasury to increase its legal borrowing capacity to pay the expenses for programs previously written into law; and

"Whereas, in May 1984, the debt ceiling was increased another $30 billion to $1.520 trillion; and

"Whereas, in June 1984, the debt ceiling was raised again, this time by $53 billion, with the debt ceiling set at $1.573 trillion; and

"Whereas, the interest payments on the public debt represented 13 cents per dollar of federal budget outlays in fiscal year 1984; and

"Whereas, the net interest owed on the public debt is estimated at $109.5 billion in 1984—the equivalent of $300 million a day—and at $130.9 billion in 1985; and

"Whereas, for fiscal year 1989, the Office of Management and Budget forecasts net interest costs of the public debt at $153.1 billion, and the Congressional Budget Office projects net interest costs of the debt at $214 billion, which figures respectively represent $419 million and $586 million owed for each day of the year in interest alone; and

"Whereas, in the past 5 years, the gross federal debt has almost doubled and is expected to total, $1.807 trillion by the end of fiscal year 1985.

"Now, therefore, be it resolved by the Senate and the House of Representatives of the State of Montana:

"(1) That the Legislature call upon the President of the United States to immediately submit to the United States Congress a balanced federal budget.

"(2) That the United States Congress adopt a balanced budget for the ensuing federal fiscal year.

"(3) That the Secretary of State send a copy of this resolution to the President of the United States, the Speaker and Clerk of the United States House of Representatives, the President and Secretary of the United States Senate, and to each member of the Montana Congressional delegation."

POM-176. Joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Maine; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

"JOINT RESOLUTION MEMORIALIZING THE FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION CONCERNING OPPOSITION OF THE MAINE LEGISLATURE TO PROPOSED TRADE REGULATION RULES OF THE FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION WHICH WOULD REMOVE EXISTING RESTRICTIONS IN THE STATE OF MAINE ON COMMERCIAL OPTOMETRIC PRACTICE

"We, your Memorialists, the Senate and the House of Representatives of the State of Maine, now assembled in the First Regular Session of the One Hundred and Twelfth Legislature, most respectfully present and petition the Federal Trade Commission as follows:

"Whereas, the Federal Trade Commission is currently considering rules relating to the corporate practice of optometry most recently set forth in 16 Code of Federal Regulations, Part 456; and

"Whereas, the Maine Legislature has enacted comprehensive legislation regulating the practice of optometry in Maine, set forth in the Maine Revised Statutes, Title 32, chapter 34-A; and

"Whereas, the State has specifically addressed the issue of the corporate practice of optometry in the Maine Revised Statutes, Title 32, sections 2434 and 2435; and

"Whereas, the State of Maine and the Legislature have historically devoted extensive consideration to the issue of the corporate practice of optometry, beginning in

Maine's first corporate practice law, enacted in 1939, and in subsequent legislation in 1951 and, most recently, in 1981 and 1982, during the 110th session of the Maine Legislature; and

"Whereas, the Maine Legislature is empowered and directed by the citizenry of Maine to enact such legislation as will protect the health, welfare and interests of the citizens of Maine, and Maine Legislatures have done so in enacting laws related to the practice of optometry in the State; and

"Whereas, the federal rule-making process and the rules now under consideration by the Federal Trade Commission will not reflect or address the needs of the citizens of the State, as does the legislation which has been enacted by Maine Legislatures; and

"Whereas, the authority of Maine Legislatures, and now the 112th Maine Legislature, to enact legislation which protects the health, welfare and interests of the citizenry of the State of Maine should not be usurped by the federal rule-making process now under consideration by the Federal Trade Commission; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That We, your Memorialists, do hereby respectfully urge that the Federal Trade Commission refuse to adopt the rules now under consideration which would preempt the laws of Maine regarding the commercial practice of optometry; and be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this resolution, duly authenticated by the Secretary of State, be transmitted by the Secretary of State to the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives in the Congress of the United States, to each member of the Maine Congressional Delegation and to each member of the Federal Trade Commission."

POM-177. Concurrent resolution adopted by the General Assembly of the State of Pennsylvania; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

"HOUSE RESOLUTION No. 31

"Whereas, The Secretary of Transportation has called for bids on the transfer of the Federal Government's stock in the Consolidated Rail Corporation known as Conrail; and

"Whereas, Conrail is the preeminent rail freight carrier in the Commonwealth, employing over 14,000 Pennsylvanians, nearly 40% of its total work force; and

"Whereas, One quarter of Conrail's route mileage is located within Pennsylvania; and

"Whereas, Since 1976 Conrail has invested in excess of one-half billion dollars on maintenance and right-of-way improvement projects in this Commonwealth; and

"Whereas, Pennsylvania industries rely heavily on Conrail for moving three-quarters of a million carloads of raw materials and finished products annually; and

"Whereas, The corporate headquarters of Conrail is located in Philadelphia, accounting for 4,500 jobs in the southeastern region of this Commonwealth; and

"Whereas, Two of Conrail's five regional offices and four of seventeen divisional offices are located in this Commonwealth; and

"Whereas, Conrail maintains high volume classification yards at Conway, Enola and Allentown and many additional classification and industrial yards throughout this Commonwealth that process one-quarter of all Conrail traffic systemwide; and

"Whereas, Conrail has spent millions of dollars building and upgrading intermodal terminals in Morrisville, Harrisburg and Pittsburgh; and

"Whereas, Conrail has its major locomotive and freight car maintenance facilities in Altoona; and

"Whereas, Two-thirds of Conrail's maintenance employees work in this Commonwealth; and

"Whereas, Members of organized rail labor have contributed to make Conrail a financial success by increasing productivity and agreeing to wage deferrals totaling four hundred million dollars over the last three and one-half years with the expressed goal of preserving jobs in Pennsylvania and elsewhere on the Conrail system; and

"Whereas, Conrail is an integral part of moving and marketing Pennsylvania coal, with the railroad directly serving over 100 mines and providing connections to short lines serving over 30 additional mines in this Commonwealth; and

"Whereas, The General Assembly recognized the importance of Conrail to the Commonwealth's coal industry and greatly assisted the financing of the coal transfer facility at Pier 124 in Philadelphia by providing 22.6 million dollars in reconstruction funds; and

"Whereas, Pennsylvania has more operating short line railroads than any other state, with most of those small carriers totally reliant on Conrail for their vital outlet to the Nations's rail network; and

"Whereas, Conrail has amply demonstrated its ability to operate and prosper as an independent rail carrier serving Pennsylvania and the northeast quadrant of the Nation by earning one-half billion dollars net income in calendar year 1984; and

"Whereas, All other major railroads in the United States are stockholder owned; therefore be it

"Resolved (the Senate concurring), That the General Assembly of Pennsylvania implore the President of the United States, members of Congress and the Secretary of Transportation to select a public stock offering proposal for the return of Conrail to the private sector that includes the following provisions; significant employee ownership; a 10% ownership limitation by any holder or affiliates on common stock that is publicly offered; and the provision of funds from the proceeds of the Conrail sale to states in the Conrail service region for purposes of freight rail service preservation of rail-related infrastructure improvements, including grade-crossings and bridges and the provisions of Title VII of the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973 (Public Law 93-236, 45 U.S.C. Ch. 16, Subch. VII), as amended by the Northeast Rail Service Act of 1981 (Public Law 97-35, 95 Stat. 357); and be it further Resolved, That copies of this resolution be transmitted immediately to the President of the United States, the Secretary of Transportation, the presiding officers of each house of Congress and to each member of Congress from Pennsylvania."

POM-178. A resolution adopted by the Legislature of the Territory of Guam; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

"Be it resolved by the legislature of the Territory of Guam:

"Whereas, the Guam water delivery and storage system is in need of construction of new lines and storage facilities and extensive repair to existing ones; and

"Whereas, the United States Congress recognized the need to assist Guam in improving this most essential part of her infrastructure; and

"Whereas, in Public Law 98-454, Section 401, Sixteen Million Three Hundred Thousand Dollars ($16,300,000) was authorized to be appropriated in Fiscal Year 1985 for improvements to Guam's water system; and

"Whereas, the legislative history of that section indicates that when the Bureau of Reclamation's final recommendations on Guam's water system are made, the Congress may need to revise the authorization; and

"Whereas, the Public Utility Agency of Guam has identified twelve (12) projects which will bring relief to those suffering from water shortages; and

"Whereas, the twelve (12) projects are:

"(1) Equipping eight (8) deep wells with larger pumps	400,000.00
"(2) Exploration and construction of wells in Southern Guam	700,000.00
"(3) Barrigada Booster Station	400,000.00
"(4) Inarajan River Water Treatment Plant	2,000,000.00
"(5) Umatac-Lasa Fua River Water Treatment Facility with a capacity of approximately 150 59 200 GPM	1,300,000.00
"(6) Malojloj-Inarajan Water Transmission Line	1,840,000.00
"(7) Mangilao-Inarajan Water Transmission Line	3,600,000.00
"(8) Pago Bay-Togcha Water Transmission Line	1,520,000.00
"(9) Barrigada and Mangilao Reservoir with connecting pipeline	2,000,000.00
"(10) Macheche Water Transmission Line	585,000.00
"(11) Improvement of Laelae Spring Water Treatment Plant and Transmission Line	950,000.00
"(12) Development of Agana Spring Wells	1,000,000.00;

now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, that Congressman Ben Blaz is respectfully requested to pursue the appropriation of Sixteen Million Two Hundred Ninety Five Thousand Dollars ($16,295,000) of the amount authorized for appropriation in Public Law 98-454 for these twelve projects; and be it further

"Resolved, that the Speaker certify to and the Legislative Secretary attest the adoption hereof and that copies of the same be thereafter transmitted to the President of the United States Senate; to the Speaker of the House of Representatives; to President Ronald Reagan; Richard T. Montoya, Assistant Secretary, Territorial and International Affairs; to Congressman Morris Udall, Chairman, House Interior and Insular Affairs; to Congressman John F. Seiberling; to the Director, Bureau of Reclamation; to Congressman Ben Blaz; to the Chief Officer, Public Utility Agency of Guam; and to the Governor of Guam."

POM-179. Joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

"HOUSE RESOLUTION No. 12

"Whereas, The United States Secretary of the Interior has instructed the Bureau of Reclamation and the Fish and Wildlife Service to close Kesterson Reservoir, plug the San Luis Drain, and cease delivery of water to lands which drain into the reservoir; and

"Whereas, The decision of the Secretary of the Interior will force 49,000 acres of prime agricultural land out of production in Fresno County, the nation's No. 1 producing agricultural county, resulting in an estimated $133,000,000 first-year loss in residential and agricultural property value and income derived from direct farm product sales, indirect business, and personal and retail sales; and

"Whereas, Over 1,200 farm-related jobs will be eliminated and over 3,000 jobs indirectly affected by that loss, thereby adversely impacting the economies of communities throughout the affected area; and

"Whereas, Plummeting land values will result in a lower tax base, thereby causing a reduction in the quality and quantity of essential public services delivered to residents located within the affected area; and POM-180. Resolution adopted by the Senate of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico; to the Committee on Finance.

"RESOLUTION

"STATEMENT OF MOTIVES

"During the past years Puerto Rico has been suffering from a high unemployment rate. The labor Intensive industries that generated employment have been leaving the Island because they have lost their competitive capacity due to high costs. The corporations operating in Puerto Rico by virtue of the provisions of Section 936 have allowed the Commonwealth to replace many of the lost jobs with high-technology and better remunerated jobs.

"Section 936 of the Federal Internal Revenue Act provides tax exemption on the profits earned by industries that are subsidiaries of corporations established in the United States. Such legislation constitutes a considerable source of employment, as well as income to the Puerto Rican economy. Furthermore, said exemption is an highly-important incentive for the establishment of new subsidiary corporations on the island, which would, in turn, generate more jobs and income.

"If the exemption provided by the above mentioned Section 936 were eliminated, the economy of Puerto Rico, as well as the Puerto Rican labor force would receive a severe blow, and likewise, the great number of Puerto Ricans who depend on it.

"By repealing Section 936, the Federal Treasury would not receive any additional real income, because it is most probable that the corporations that benefit from this privilege in Puerto Rico would delay or postpone the payment of their income taxes to the United States Treasury for an indefinite period of time, by reincorporating in jurisdictions outside of the United States.

"It is also possible that the action of eliminating Section 936 would increase the federal deficit, on account of the payment of additional social welfare benefits to workers who become unemployed. Likewise, migration to the continental United States would increase, which would add to burdens of the United States social welfare system.

"Section 936 has allowed Puerto Rico to replace many of the jobs lost because of the Commonwealth's loss of competitive capacity on a wage level, by providing better jobs in highly-technical industries.

"One of the main functions of this Legislature, as the direct representative of the people, is to watch over the fiscal stability of the Commonwealth and all those other conditions and opportunities which propitiate an increase in the labor force. For this reason, and responding to a legitimate concern in view of the possibility that the Section 936 exemption could be eliminated according to press reports, the Senate of Puerto Rico considers it an inescapable obligation to express itself on this respect, and to make it known to the pertinent North American authorities.

"Be it resolved by the Legislature of Puerto Rico:

"Section 1.—To express to the President of the United States, Hon. Ronald Reagan, the House of Representatives, and the Senate of the United States the desire of the People of Puerto Rico to keep in effect Section 936 of the Federal Internal Revenue Act, which grants federal tax exemption to corporations established in Puerto Rico, which are subsidiaries of corporations located in the United States.

"Section 2.—A copy of this Resolution, duly translated into the English language, shall be sent to the President of the United States, to the House of Representatives, and to the Senate of the United States."

POM-182. Joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Montana; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

"SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION No. 23

"Whereas, our nation has been immeasurably strengthened by the contributions of ethnic and religious groups from around the world, including Catholics and Protestants from Northern Ireland; and

"Whereas, our country's strong traditional ties of friendship and a shared heritage with the Republic of Ireland and Great Britain have contributed to the well-being of all three nations; and

"Whereas, the people of Ireland continue to suffer from political and civil strife that rends the fabric of human society; and

"Whereas, we take no side in the Irish dispute, but deplore all violence from whatever source; and

"Whereas, the United States, in the spirit of peace and humanity, has interceded in other areas and lands torn by civil strife to bring about a lasting resolution of the problem and lay to rest the specter of religious bitterness; and

"Whereas, the United States can and should take a constructive part in bringing about a peaceful solution to the problems that divide Ireland: Now, therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and the House of Representatives of the State of Montana: That the United States is able to, and in fact should, take the lead in formulating and effecting a peaceful and just resolution to these problems because the United States has benefited so greatly during the past 150 years from its relationships with both Ireland and Great Britain.

"Be it further resolved, That Congress is urged to pass legislation calling for the President to appoint a Special Envoy to be dispatched to Ireland for the purpose of participating in and bringing about a resolution to the centuries-old problems in Ireland and specifically since 1921 in Northern Ireland.

"Be it further resolved, That the President, accordingly, is urged to appoint the Special Envoy without delay upon receipt of the congressional action.

"Be it further resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent by the Secretary of State to the President of the United States, the Speaker and Chief Clerk of the U.S. House of Representatives, the President and Secretary of the U.S. Senate, the Irish and British ambassadors to the United States, the members of the Montana Congressional Delegation, and Congressman Mario Biaggi, chairman of the ad hoc Congressional Committee for Irish Affairs."

POM-185. A concurrent resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Mississippi; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

"HOUSE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION No. 189

"Whereas, there is presently under consideration at the federal level a proposal based upon a Grace Commission recommendation to close some twelve thousand (12,000) small post offices throughout this Nation; and

"Whereas, such action would result in the closing of at least one hundred fifty-one (151) post offices in the State of Mississippi, which represents over thirty-three percent (33%) of the total offices operating in Mississippi; and

"Whereas, the closing of post offices on this scale would be extremely detrimental to the United States Postal Service; and

"Whereas, it is the opinion of this Legislature that Mississippi's economy is dependent on the operation of all post offices in Mississippi and that such offices should continue to serve the people of our state:

Now, therefore, be it resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Mississippi, the Senate concurring therein, That we do hereby oppose any federal action which would result in the closing of any post offices in the State of Mississippi.

"Be it further resolved, That copies of this resolution be furnished to the President and Vice President of the United States, the Mississippi Congressional Delegation, to Mr. Charles W. Holmes and to Ms. Clara Johnson, President and Vice President, respectively, of the State Chapter of the National Association of Postmasters of the United States, and to members of the Capitol Press Corps."

POM-186. Concurrent resolution adopted by the Legislative Assembly of the State of North Dakota; to the Select Committee on Indian Affairs.

"SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION No. 4075

"Whereas, loss of rights to Indians and non-Indians has occurred within the exterior boundaries of Indian reservations located in this state since statehood because of the lack of state civil jurisdiction within those boundaries; and

"Whereas, the great hope of obtaining justice on the Indian reservations of this state reflected in the report of the Legislative Research Committee to the Thirty-eighth Legislative Assembly has not materialized through the procedure provided under Chapter 27-19 of the North Dakota Century Code; and

"Whereas, 22 years have now elapsed since the adoption of Chapter 27-19 with no prospects in sight for ensuring justice in civil cases exceeding the present $300 jurisdictional limit of tribal courts within the exterior boundaries of Indian reservations of this state; and

"Whereas, the Congress of the United States has further complicated the matter of resolving Indian jurisdiction problems through the enactment of amendments to Public Law 280 in 1968 and by the enactment of the Indian's Civil Rights Act [Pub. L. 90-284, Sections 401, 402, 406, 82 Stat. 78-80; 25 U.S.C. Sections 1321, 1322, 1326]; and

"Whereas, the Supreme Court of this state in the case Three Affiliated Tribes v. Wold Engineering, Civil No. 10,172, has analysed the problem of state courts' jurisdiction over Indian reservations and has urged the attention not only of the Legislative Assembly of the state of North Dakota, but also the Congress of the United States;

"Now, therefore be it resolved by the Senate of the State of North Dakota, the House of Representatives concurring therein: That the Legislative Council study the problem of civil jurisdiction within the exterior boundaries of the Indian reservations of this state; and

"Be it further resolved, That the Legislative Council is encouraged to include on the committee assigned to study this matter a representative from each of the Indian reservations of this state and an equal number of representatives from the North Dakota Association of Counties; and

"Be it further resolved, That the Legislative Council is encouraged to hold hearings on the respective Indian reservations and at appropriate county seats, and to meet with a like committee created by the Congress of the United States, if possible, and to meet and confer with other appropriate state and federal officials as well as the North Dakota Congressional Delegation; and

"Be it further resolved, That the Legislative Council seek the assistance of the Governor of this state and the North Dakota Congressional Delegation in securing the creation of a national committee to study the problems of civil jurisdiction within the exterior boundaries of Indian reservations throughout the United States, and to consider, among other things, amending federal law:

"1. To require that Indian people accept state civil jurisdiction within the exterior boundaries of reservations;

"2. To create a federal court to hear civil cases arising within the exterior boundaries of reservations; or

"3. To transfer such cases to existing federal courts; and

"Be it further resolved, That the Legislative Council report its findings and recommendations, together with any legislation required to implement those recommendations, to the Fiftieth Legislative Assembly; and

"Be it further resolved, That the Secretary of State send copies of this resolution to the leadership of the United States House of Representatives, including the Speaker, the Majority Leader, the Majority Whip, the Minority Leader, and the Minority Whip; the leadership of the Senate, including the Majority Leader, the Majority Whip, the Minority Leader, and the Minority Whip; the members of the North Dakota Congressional Delegation; the Governor; the Attorney General; the United States Attorney for North Dakota; the Executive Director of the North Dakota Association of Counties; the Executive Director of the Indian Affairs Commission; the President of the United States; the Vice President of the United States; the Secretary of the Interior; and the Attorney General of the United States."

POM-187. A concurrent resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Arizona; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

"SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 1001

"Whereas, the First Congress of the United States of America at its First Session, in both Houses, by a constitutional majority of two-thirds thereof, adopted the following proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States of America in the following words, to wit:

The Conventions of a number of the States having at the time of their adopting the Constitution expressed a desire, in order to prevent misconstruction or abuse of its powers, that further declaratory and restrictive clauses should be added: And as extending the ground of public confidence in the government will best insure the beneficent ends of its institution—

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, two-thirds of both Houses concurring, That the following articles be proposed to the legislatures of the several states as amendments to the constitution of the United States, all or any of which articles, when ratified by three fourths of the said legislatures, to be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of the said Constitution, viz.:

ARTICLES IN ADDITION TO, AND AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, PROPOSED BY CONGRESS AND RATIFIED BY THE LEGISLATURES OF THE SEVERAL STATES, PURSUANT TO THE FIFTH ARTICLE OF THE ORIGINAL CONSTITUTION

"Art. II. No law varying the compensation for the services of the Senators and Representatives shall take effect, until an election of Representatives shall have intervened.

"Therefore be it resolved by the Legislature of the State of Arizona:

"1. That such proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States of America be and the same is hereby ratified.

"2. That the Secretary of State is requested to transmit certified copies of this Resolution to the Administrator of General Services, Washington, D.C., and the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States."

"HOUSE RESOLUTION No. 78

"Whereas, there is presently under consideration at the federal level a proposal based upon a Grace Commission recommendation to close Job Corps training centers throughout this Nation; and

"Whereas, such action would result in the closing of several such centers in the State of Mississippi; and

"Whereas, the closing of Job Corps centers would be extremely detrimental to the state and its citizens; and

"Whereas, it is the opinion of this House of Representatives that Mississippi's economy is dependent on the operation of all Job

Corps centers in Mississippi and that such offices should continue to serve the people of our state:

"Now, therefore, be it resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Mississippi, That we do hereby oppose any federal action which would result in the closing of any Job Corps training in the State of Mississippi.

Be it further resolved, That copies of this resolution be furnished to the President and Vice President of the United States, the Mississippi Congressional Delegation and to members of the Capitol Press Corps."

POM-189. A joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Maine; to the Committee on Small Business.

"JOINT RESOLUTION MEMORIALIZING CONGRESS TO RESTORE FUNDING FOR THE SMALL BUSINESS ADMINISTRATION

"We, your Memorialists, the Senate and the House of Representatives of the State of Maine in the One Hundred and Twelfth Legislative Session now assembled, most respectfully present and petition the Congress of the United States, as follows:

"Whereas, 97% of all businesses in Maine are defined by the Small Business Administration as being small businesses; and

"Whereas, in 1984, the Small Business Administration approved $29.3 million in loans to 188 small businesses; maintained a portfolio of over 2,900 loans with more than $134 million; sponsored training programs for over 4,000 small business people; and, by establishing a resolving line of credit financing, made available working capital loans up to $1 million to exporters; and

"Whereas, the Small Business Development Center, whose principal source of funding is the Small Business Administration, provided counseling to more than 1,300 businesses, training programs for over 1,500 small business people and responded to more than 650 information requests through its Business Information Service; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved: That We, your Memorialists, respectfully urge and request that the Congress of the United States restore the funding for the Small Business Administration, which has assisted Maine business throughout the years; and be it further

"Resolved: That a copy of this Memorial duly authenticated by the Secretary of State, be transmitted forthwith by the Secretary of State to each member of the Maine Congressional Delegation and to the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States."

By Mr. LUGAR:

S. 1000. A bill to establish a conservation acreage reserve program and to promote the conservation of highly erodible land, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

AGRICULTURAL RESOURCE CONSERVATION ACT

● Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce the Agricultural Resource Conservation Act of 1985. This legislation establishes consistency within U.S. farm policy by restricting Federal price support and loan incentives to agricultural producers who choose to farm highly erodible lands. This legislation does not restrict or limit a person's right to use owned property in any manner. It simply makes clear that Federal farm and loan programs will not be used as an incentive for farmers to plow grasslands simply to increase their share of Federal crop payments.

The Federal Government has encouraged farmers to plow marginal lands with its misguided price support programs. The size of virtually all farm price support payments rise proportionately as the farmer's so-called base acreage increases. With prime agricultural lands being a limited resource, the least cost method for increasing base acreage is to plow timber and pasture acreage that are likely to be producing less income than is presently being offered by the Federal support programs.

U.S. taxpayers are asked to pay many times for this ill-advised activity. They provide the incentive payments that result in this land being brought into production. They are required by law to give low-interest disaster loans and subsidized crop insurance when these lands experience a crop failure due to drought which is common place on highly erodible acres. Once the landowner breaks the soil and discovers the newly created erosion problems, U.S. taxpayers are there with conservation cost-sharing activities to reduce erosion on land that should not have been plowed at the onset and would not have been plowed had it not been for the Federal price support payments. A significant portion of the $1 billion annually appropriated to the Corps of Engineers goes to remove runoff and sediment from our rivers and streams.

This bill contains the so-called sodbuster language that prohibits price support and other forms of Federal payments to farmers who choose to plow highly erodible land. The plowing of this land has not been carefully monitored in the past, and national data is difficult to compile. The Soil Conservation Service, however, estimates that approximately 500,000 acres of such land in Colorado was plowed between 1979 and 1982. In South Dakota, it is estimated that 600,000 acres were converted to cropland between 1974 and 1982. Testimony presented before the Senate Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry suggest that as much as 250 million additional acres of highly erodible lands could be brought under cultivation unless the incentives are phased out of the system. This would increase our current crop acreage by more than 50 percent.

The sodbuster provisions do not prevent a landowner from qualifying for crop price supports. Highly erodible land that is brought into production with an approved soil conservation plan is eligible for all price support benefits. As was negotiated with previous sodbuster legislation that passed the Senate, the restrictions would not apply to land that has been under cultivation in the last 10 years, and therefore, does not penalize farmers who were eligible for Federal payments at the time that they chose to plow the erodible land.

Mr. President, while the sodbuster provisions will help to discourage the plowing of another 250 million acres of highly erodible land, it is unfortunate that this legislation was not enacted into law a decade ago. The 1982 national resource inventories conducted by the Soil Conservation Service reveals that nearly 1 out of every 4 crop acres is suffering a rate of erosion at more than double the soil's renewable capacity. Nearly 50 percent of the sheet and rill erosion in the United States occurs on only 10 percent of the cropland. In order to reduce erosion from this acreage, my legislation calls upon the Secretary of Agriculture to offer a 30 million acre long-term conservation reserve. The reserve would idle our most erodible cropland for a period of at least 10 years. The Secretary of Agriculture would make annual payments for all retired acreage.

Unlike past efforts, the conservation reserve does not contain a predetermined set-aside payment. Historical evidence suggests that this type of system excessively rewards some landowners while being inadequate to justify participation by others. I propose, instead, a simple bid system where each landowner desiring to enter the reserve submits competitive bids. The Secretary of Agriculture would have the authority to determine which bids are the lowest based upon the erodibility of the acreage.

The competitive bids would reflect the landowner's cost of establishing a permanent cover crop. My legislation requires that 10 percent of reserve acres be planted to trees, and similarly, the competitive bid would reflect this cost and the landowner would assume responsibility for the reforestation process.

Many are familiar with the Soil Bank Program for the late 1950's. Unfortunately, much of the lands from this acreage retirement effort represent some of today's most highly erodible cropland. I do not propose to repeat this situation with my proposed conservation reserve. Upon termination of the land retirement contract, the sodbuster provision would immediately become applicable to the conservation acreage. I will not allow U.S. taxpayers to pay landowners to retire erodable acreage only to have the land brought back into production in order to increase the landowner's base acres and his or her share of Federal price support payments.

Mr. President, I cannot predict the long-term outlook on demand for U.S. agricultural goods or how much land will be required to meet this demand. Indeed, we may someday need full production from the conservation reserve acres. We may need to convert the 250 million acres of unbroken land into full-scale crop production. But this is a matter that simply must be dictated by the marketplace and not by governmental farm policy that bears no relation to actual market signals.

The fact of the matter is that today we do not need production from 420 million acres of cropland. Our farm policy, however, prevents market forces from dictating a reduction in our highly erodible and least productive cropland acres. The end result is simply overwhelming surpluses, lower farm prices, and excessive soil erosion.

The most hard-pressed farms, unfortunately, do not have the resources to adequately safeguard against soil erosion. Their objective must be to maximize production in the near term with the very minimum of costs. For these farmers, the conservation reserve offers a guaranteed annual cash income and reduces his or her need for borrowed operating capital. It allows us to assist highly leveraged farmers while at the same time moving back to a system whereby our total cropland acres are determined by the marketplace and not by the Secretary of Agriculture and the Members of Congress.

In addition, my bill proposes to require farmers who are attempting to cultivate the most erodible land to comply with locally defined conservation requirements. I do not propose to require a conservation means test for 420 million acres of agricultural lands. The administrative burden of such a requirement would be overwhelming. Instead, I simply propose that the Secretary of Agriculture focus these requirements to our most erosive cropland. Ten percent of our agricultural lands produce over one-half of the total cropland erosion.

I recently chaired conservation hearings at the Senate Agriculture Committee. Witnesses testified that over 20 percent of the set-aside acreage for feed grains, and wheat in a 10 State midwestern region is not planted to a cover crop during the set-aside period. This barren land is the source of much of our erosion difficulties. My legislation requires the Secretary of Agriculture to issue regulations that would reduce erosion from this set-aside acreage. I recognize the difficulty that a mandatory cover crop creates for summer fallow wheat farmers and other operations. My legislation, therefore, does not require a cover crop on set-aside acreage, but simply requires the Secretary to issue fair and equitable regulations to reduce erosion from set-aside acre where a cover crop is advisable.

To summarize, my bill calls for, first, an end to Federal subsidies to farmers who plow highly erodible land unless accompanied by an approved conservation plan; second, the establishment of a long-term conservation reserve; third, an approved conservation plan for our most highly erodible cropland in order to qualify for price support payments; and fourth, a cover crop requirement for those set-aside acres that are subject to severe wind and water erosion.

I will offer these provisions during the Senate Agriculture Committee's markup of the 1985 farm bill. I hope my colleagues will join me in this effort to reduce soil erosion and to establish some consistency in all future Federal farm programs.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a summary of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the summary was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SECTION-BY-SECTION SUMMARY

CONSERVATION ACREAGE RESERVE

The Secretary shall conserve up to 30 million acres of erosion-prone crop land to conservation use.

The reserve's contract period shall be no less than ten years and no more than twenty years.

The Secretary shall control entry into the reserve in such a way so as not to adversely affect local economies.

The amount payable to landowners for annual conservation payments shall be determined through the submission of bids by the landowner.

At least ten percent of the funds made available for the conservation reserve shall be used for landowners who agree to plant trees.

The Secretary maintains full authority to terminate the reserve should conditions warrant such a change. The House and Senate Agriculture Committees must be notified at least ninety days prior to such a decision.

The landowner may not receive conservation reserve payments in excess of $50,000 annually.

SODBUSTER

Any person who produces an agricultural commodity on a field on which highly erodible land is the predominant class should be ineligible for Federal price supports, farm storage payments, Federal Crop Insurance, disaster payments, or an FmHA loan unless:

1. A crop had been produced from the land between 1973 and the date of enactment of this bill.

2. The land is brought into production using an approved conservation plan.

CONSERVATION PRACTICES ON EXEMPTED HIGHLY ERODIBLE LAND

In order to qualify for price support payments, any person who produces an agricultural commodity on highly erodible land must use conservation practices determined appropriate for the area.

COVER CROP REQUIREMENT

The Secretary is required to issue regulations to assure that set-aside acres are adequately protected from wind and water erosion for the entire set-aside period.

By Mr. MATTINGLY:

S. 1001. A bill to impose a minimum mandatory bail on all persons charged with a serious drug offense in the amount of $100,000 plus an amount equal to the street value of the drugs involved in the offense; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

MINIMUM MANDATORY BAIL FOR SERIOUS DRUG OFFENSES

● Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation to impose a minimum mandatory bail on all persons charged with a serious drug offense. Under the provisions of my proposal, the minimum bail amount for any person charged with an offense under the Controlled Substances Act which carries with it a maximum prison term of 10 years or more would be the sum of $100,000 plus the amount equal to the street value of the drugs involved in the offense.

I believe this legislation is consistent with the Comprehensive Crime Control Act which Congress passed and the President signed into law last year. That measure, which I strongly supported, contained a provision which allows for pretrial detention. Federal judges are now allowed to consider danger to the community in setting or denying bail. My legislation would not affect this provision. It would remain in place, as I believe it should. But in cases where Federal judges do not consider drug traffickers a danger to the community—which, Mr. President, I want to say at this point is a concept I fail to grasp—the judge would be required to set the minimum bail.

I believe that drug traffickers are the most dangerous of all criminals. The crimes they commit are not motivated by passion or conviction. They are motivated by greed and hatred. Their effect is to kill and to destroy, to destroy individual lives and the collective lives of families, communities, and, I believe, ultimately of this Nation, if we do not take strong action. This bill sends a clear signal and establishes once and for all that the Congress of the United States considers drug traffickers a danger to the community.

Let me answer the critics who would say the comprehensive crime package is enough before they speak. It is a good beginning, but it is not enough. There remains the possibility of a lenient judge and small bail amount. In realistic terms, that means there remains the possibility of an easy release and the opportunity to flee to avoid prosecution.

I believe that an article which appeared in the Washington Post on March 28 of this year makes a strong case for my legislation. The story reported:

A New York man has been arrested after what police described as the largest seizure of cocaine in Montgomery County history—11 pounds of cocaine with an estimated street value of $2 million * * *

And the story went on the say that:

Capt. Don Deering, of the Maryland National Capital Park Police, said Donald Chin, 43, was charged with possession of cocaine with intent to distribute * * * Deering said the cocaine is thought to be of "high quality." Chin was originally held on $100,000 bond; but it was reduced to $25,000 at a hearing yesterday.

Mr. President, we are engaged in a war against illegal drugs in this Nation. If we are going to win—and we cannot afford to lose—we must build a strong and varied arsenal. The legislation I am introducing today would add another weapon. I invite my colleagues to cosponsor this measure and urge their strong support.●

By Mr. THURMOND (for himself, Mr. SPECTER, and Mr. METZENBAUM):

S. 1002. A bill to amend the Lanham Act to improve certain provisions relating to concurrent registrations; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AMENDMENTS TO LANHAM TRADEMARK ACT

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation which would correct an anomaly in the Federal laws governing trademarks. This bill is identical to an amendment which was offered on my behalf to H.R. 6286 at the end of the 98th Congress. My amendment was adopted without objection by the Senate.

The loophole which this bill is designed to address is illustrated by the plight of Associates First Capital Corp., a wholly owned subsidiary of Gulf & Western Industries. As that situation has been described to me, in late 1982, Associates proposed the mark "Equity Express" in connection with a loan service for homeowners. An independent professional search of all data bases as of December 13, 1982, disclosed no conflicting prior uses. In fact, however, Washington Mutual Savings Bank of Seattle, WA, had adopted the same mark for similar services on October 18, 1982, but its pending application had not arrived into the data bases as of the date of search. Upon discovery of their dual use of the mark, the two users entered into an agreement that acknowledged Washington Mutual's exclusive rights in 4 States and Associates' exclusive rights in 46 States.

While Associates' right to continued use of the mark is clear, an anomaly in the Lanham Act (15 U.S.C. Sec. 1051 et seq.) precludes Associates from obtaining a Federal concurrent use registration to protect its rights by foreclosing subsequent use by others in the States where Associates is clearly the first user. This is notwithstanding the fact that the Lanham Act expressly provides for, and indeed encourages, concurrent use registrations.

Under 15 U.S.C. Section 1052(d), a concurrent use registration may be granted in the discretion of the Patent and Trademark Commissioner in two situations. First, it may be granted if both parties use the mark before the first filing date. Second, such a registration may be granted if a court determines that more than one party is entitled to use. In Associates' case, or in the case of any similarly situated party, neither provision technically affords relief. Associates' lawful use of the mark occurred after Washington's filing date, but before anyone could reasonably have known of its filing and before its registration date. No court order is possible because the parties' amicable resolution of their differences means there is no case or controversy which could form the basis for a suit.

The Patent and Trademark Office has acknowledged that the parties are affected by an anomaly in the law. That office has indicated that it would accept the narrowly worded change in the Lanham Act which is contained in the bill I am introducing. This language will permit the Patent and Trademark Commissioner to grant concurrent registrations where the first filing party consents to such registration. As with any concurrent registration, the Commissioner would be required to determine that confusion or deception would not be likely to result and would be authorized to impose conditions relating to the mode or place of use of the mark to prevent such confusion or deception.

The remedy proposed presents no antitrust problems. On the contrary, it will serve to promote alternative business efforts by making a given trademark available for registration to more than one user.

Unlike rights in a patent, the courts have consistently held that rights in a trademark do not constitute a monopoly. See, for example, J.T. McCarthy, Trademarks and Unfair Competition, section 2.5b (1984) and cases cited therein. A trademark represents the right of a trademark owner to prevent others from confusing the public. Concurrent use registrations also serve to prevent confusion due to the limitations imposed by the Patent Commissioner, such as distinct geographic areas of activity, and do not limit competition. Indeed, in the example I cited, Associates and Washington Mutual will compete against each other in the latter's area, with Associates employing a different mark. Concurrent registration under limitations imposed by the Commissioner will not only ensure that consumers are not confused in areas where they do not compete, but that others could not engage in deception by using the same mark in other areas.

Mr. President, in light of the strong bipartisan support that my amendment enjoyed in the Judiciary Committee and the entire Senate in the last Congress, I am hopeful that we will be able to act favorably upon this bill at the earliest opportunity.

By Mr. DOMENICI (for himself, Mr. SIMPSON, Mr. BINGAMAN, and Mr. WALLOP):

S. 1004. A bill to authorize and direct the Secretary of Energy to establish a program to provide for reclamation and other remedial actions with respect to mill tailings at active uranium and thorium processing sites; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

URANIUM MILL TAILINGS RECLAMATION ACT

● Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, today I am introducing the Uranium Mill Tailings Reclamation Act of 1985 on behalf of myself and my colleagues, Senators SIMPSON, BINGAMAN and WALLOP. Some of my colleagues who remember the Uranium Mill Tailings Act of 1978 might ask, "Why are we introducing another piece of legislation on this topic?" I can certainly say I wish we did not have to. Some of the provisions of that earlier legislation have been effective; for example, a number of the so-called inactive sites have begun reclamation. Because of interagency squabbles between the Nuclear Regulatory Commission and the Environmental Protection Agency, and regulations which appear to be technically indefensible, the program relating to active uranium mill tailings sites is a complete and utter failure.

What we have created is an expensive regulatory program which is tied in a knot. This comes at a time when uranium companies are shutting down their operations due to a glut of uranium on the market today and the failure of domestic utilities to sign any contracts for future supplies with our domestic producers. There is a growing concern, on my part and others, that these companies will be unable to complete the reclamation of the uranium mill tailings piles even when the regulatory knot is untied.

What we are attempting to do with this legislation is rise above all this confusion. It is time to begin the cleanup and we believe the legislation being introduced today will do just that. The legislation directs the Secretary of Energy to begin a remedial action program at the various active sites which are in existence prior to the date of enactment of this legislation. The Secretary is given the authority to designate the host State or owner of the mill tailings site to do the cleanup if that is mutually agreeable. The cleanup would be done according to the standards established under the Uranium Mill Tailings Radiation Control Act of 1978 or pursuant to the regulations established by the various agreement States. The program is as simple as that. I believe the Department of Energy has demonstrated its ability to undertake cleanup activities such as this and manage them in an effective manner.

The cost of this program would not be left solely to the Federal Government. The Federal Government is responsible for about 30 percent of the mill tailings which would be cleaned up under this program. Therefore, this legislation authorizes funds for that portion of the cleanup, which is justifiably the Government's responsibility. The uranium producers are required to pay 15 percent of the cleanup costs and the nuclear utilities, who have benefited from this uranium production, would assume 55 percent of the costs. Their share of the costs would be provided for by placing a fee of $0.15 mill per kilowatt hour on nuclear power generation. All of these funds would be placed in the uranium mill tailings funds established in the Treasury.

Mr. President, the Federal Government has been the principal source of delay in the cleanup of those sites that are ready to be cleaned up in this country. The legislation I propose today, with my colleagues, is intended to turn that around, and make the Federal Government the leader in the effort to clean up.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1004

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "Uranium Mill Tailings Reclamation Act of 1985".

FINDINGS AND PURPOSE

SEC. 2. FINDINGS AND PURPOSE.—

(a) FINDINGS.—The Congress finds that—

(1) the Uranium Mill Tailings Radiation Control Act of 1978 (42 U.S.C. 7901 et seq.) was enacted to provide for the reclamation and regulation of uranium mill tailings;

(2) the Uranium Mill Tailings Radiation Control Act of 1978 (42 U.S.C. 7901 et seq.) did not provide for a comprehensive method of financing reclamation and remedial action at active uranium and thorium processing sites; and

(3) the creation of an assured system of financing will greatly facilitate and expedite reclamation and remedial actions at such active uranium and thorium processing sites.

(b) PURPOSE.—It is the purpose of this Act—

(1) to facilitate and expedite reclamation and other remedial actions at active uranium and thorium processing sites;

(2) to establish a comprehensive system for financing reclamation and other remedial actions at such sites; and

(3) to allocate the costs of such comprehensive system of financing fairly and equitably.

REMEDIAL ACTION PERFORMED BY THE DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

SEC. 3. (a) IN GENERAL.—The Secretary of Energy, or such person as the Secretary may, by mutual agreement, designate (including the State in which the active site is located, or the owner or licensee of the active site for which reclamation, decommissioning, other remedial actions, and long-term maintenance and monitoring is to be performed) shall, except as provided in section 4, select and perform reclamation, decommissioning, other remedial actions, and long-term maintenance and monitoring at active sites (as defined in section 10(1)).

(b) APPLICABLE STANDARDS FOR REMEDIAL ACTION.—Reclamation, decommissioning, other remedial action, and long-term maintenance and monitoring performed by the Secretary or the designee of the Secretary under this section shall—

(1) comply with all applicable requirements established pursuant to the Uranium Mill Tailings Radiation Control Act of 1978, as amended, or where appropriate, requirements established by a State that is a party to a discontinuance agreement under section 274 of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954 (42 U.S.C. 2021); and

(2) be undertaken in consultation, as appropriate, with the State in which such active site is located, and in the case of Indian lands, the appropriate Indian tribe and the Secretary of the Interior.

(c) CONSENT OF PROCESSING SITE OWNER.—Unless the Commission determines that a permanent cessation of operations leading to the production of byproduct material has occurred at any active site, the Secretary or the designee of the Secretary shall commence actual reclamation and decommissioning activities only with the consent of the owner of the active site in question.

(d) CONTRACTS WITH OWNERS OR LICENSEES.—The Secretary may enter into a contract with the owner or licensee of an active site for any reclamation, decommissioning, other remedial action, or long-term maintenance and monitoring associated with that active site.

(e) TRANSFER OF LICENSES AND TITLE TO BYPRODUCT MATERIAL.—Not later than the date on which the Secretary or the designee of the Secretary begins reclamation and decommissioning activities at an active site, any license pertaining to byproduct material at such site shall be transferred to the Secretary and owernship of such byproduct material and land, including any interests in such byproduct material and land that is used for the processing and disposal of such byproduct material, shall be transferred as provided in section 83(b) of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954 (42 U.S.C. 2113(b)).

(f) COSTS OF REMEDIAL ACTION TO BE PAID FROM TAILINGS FUND.—The costs for reclamation, decommissioning, other remedial action, and long-term maintenance and monitoring performed by the Secretary or the designee of the Secretary under this Act shall be paid from the Uranium Mill Tailings Fund established in section 8.

REMEDIAL ACTION PERFORMED BY OWNERS OR LICENSEES

SEC. 4. (a) IN GENERAL.—Notwithstanding section 3, an owner or licensee of an active site initially licensed after effective date of this Act, may elect (in lieu of the Secretary) to select and to perform reclamation, decommissioning, or other remedial action at such active site.

(b) REMEDIAL ACTION TO BE PERFORMED IN ACCORDANCE WITH APPLICABLE STANDARDS.—Any reclamation, decommissioning, or other remedial action performed under subsection (a) by an owner or licensee shall comply with all applicable requirements established pursuant to the Uranium Mill Tailings Radiation Control Act of 1978, as amended (or, where appropriate, requirements established by a State that is a party to a discontinuance agreement under section 274 of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954 (42 U.S.C. 2021)).

REIMBURSEMENT OF COSTS

SEC. 5. (a) IN GENERAL.—The Secretary shall, subject to subsection (b), provide for reimbursement of costs, as determined by the Secretary, of any reclamation, decommissioning, other remedial action, and long-term maintenace and monitoring performed in connection with a site to which section 3 is applicable.

(b) LIMITATIONS.—

(1) Any reimbursement provided under subsection (a) shall be made

(A) only to the licensee or to a property owner of record at the time such remedial action was undertaken; and

(B) only with respect to costs incurred by such licensee or property owner.

(2) No reimbursement for actual costs of reclamation, decommissioning, other remedial action, or long-term maintenance and monitoring may be made unless the Secretary, in consultation with the Commission (or, where appropriate, and Agreement State), determines that such reclamation, decommissioning, other remedial action, or long-term maintenance and monitoring is necessary to comply with the requirements established pursuant to the Uranium Mill Tailings Radiation Control Act of 1978, as amended, (or, where appropriate, requirements established by a State that is a party to a discontinuance agreement under section 274 of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954 (42 U.S.C. 2021)).

CONTRACT AUTHORITY FOR REMEDIAL ACTION FOR URANIUM AND THORIUM MILLS INITIALLY LICENSED AFTER EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 6. (a) IN GENERAL.—The Secretary may enter into contracts with owners or licensees of uranium or thorium mills initially licensed after the effective date of this Act to provide for the Secretary or the designee of the Secretary to perform reclamation, decommissioning, and other remedial action at such site.

(b) COSTS TO BE PAID BY OWNERS OR LICENSEES.—Each contract entered into under subsection (a) shall provide that the owner or licensee of the site for which the Secretary or the designee of the Secretary performs reclamation, decommissioning, and other remedial action shall reimburse the Tailings Fund for all reasonable costs associated with the activities of the Secretary or the designee of the Secretary under the contract.

CONTRACTS FOR PURCHASE OR SALE OF URANIUM OR THORIUM TO INCLUDE REMEDIAL ACTION FUNDING PROVISIONS

SEC. 7. Contracts for the purchase or sale of uranium or thorium entered into after the effective date of this Act shall include provisions for the cost of reclamation, decommissioning, other remedial action, and long-term maintenance and monitoring attributable to uranium and thorium processing activities conducted in the United States after the effective date of this Act.

URANIUM MILL TAILINGS FUND

SEC. 8. (a) ESTABLISHMENT OF TAILINGS FUND.—There hereby is established in the Treasury of the United States a separate fund, to be known as the Uranium Mill Tailings Fund. The Tailings Fund shall consist of—

(1) all contributions, receipts, proceeds, and recoveries realized by the Secretary of Energy under subsection (c) and section 9, which shall be deposited in the Tailings Fund immediately upon their realization;

(2) any appropriations made by the Congress to the Tailings Fund; and

(3) any unexpended balances available on the effective date of this Act, for functions or activities necessary or incident to the disposal of, or remedial action pertaining to, byproduct material, which shall automatically be transferred to the Tailings Fund on such date.

(b) USE OF TAILINGS FUND.—The Secretary of Energy may, subject to subsection (c), make expenditures from the Tailings Fund only for purposes of compliance with this Act, including expenditures for any reimbursement under section 5.

(c) ADMINISTRATION OF TAILINGS FUND.—

(1) The Secretary of the Treasury, after consultation with the Secretary of Energy, shall annually submit to the Congress a report on the financial condition and operation of the Tailings Fund during the preceding fiscal year.

(2) The Secretary of Energy shall submit the budget of the Tailings Fund to the Office of Management and Budget annually along with the budget of the Department of Energy submitted at such time in accordance with chapter 11 of title 31, United States Code. The budget of the Tailings Fund shall consist of the estimates made by the Secretary of Energy of expenditures from the Tailings Fund and other relevant financial matters for the succeeding three fiscal years, and shall be included in the Budget of the United States Government. The Secretary of Energy may make expenditures from the Tailings Fund in such amounts as approved in advance in appropriation Acts.

(3) If the Secretary of Energy determines that the Tailings Fund contains at any time amounts in excess of current needs, the Secretary of Energy may request the Secretary of the Treasury to invest such amounts, or any portion of such amounts as the Secretary of Energy determines to be appropriate, in obligations of the United States—

(A) having maturities determined by the Secretary of the Treasury to be appropriate to the needs of the Tailings Fund; and

(B) bearing interest at rates determined to be appropriate by the Secretary of the Treasury, taking into consideration the current average market yield on outstanding marketable obligations of the United States with remaining periods to maturity comparable to the maturities of such investments, except that the interest rate on such investments shall not exceed the average interest rate applicable to existing borrowings.

(4) Receipts, proceeds, and recoveries realized by the Secretary of Energy under this section, and expenditures of amounts from the Tailings Fund, shall be exempt from annual apportionment under the provisions of subchapter II of chapter 15 of title 31, United States Code.

(5) If at any time the moneys available in the Tailings Fund are insufficient to enable the Secretary of Energy to discharge the Secretary's responsibilities under this section, the Secretary of Energy shall issue to the Secretary of the Treasury obligations in such forms and denominations, bearing such maturities, and subject to such terms and conditions as may be agreed to by the Secretary of Energy and the Secretary of the Treasury. The total of such obligations shall not exceed amounts provided in appropriation Acts. Redemption of such obligations shall be made by the Secretary of Energy from moneys available in the Tailings Fund. Such obligations shall bear interest at a rate determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, and shall be not less than a rate determined by taking into consideration the average market yield on outstanding marketable obligations of the United States of comparable maturities during the month preceding the issuance of the obligations under this paragraph. The Secretary of the Treasury shall purchase any issued obligations, and for such purpose the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to use as a public debt transaction the proceeds from the sale of any securities issued under chapter 31 of title 31, United States Code, and the purposes for which securities may be issued under such chapter are extended to include any purchase of such obligations. The Secretary of the Treasury may at any time sell any of the obligations acquired by him under this paragraph. All redemptions, purchases, and sales by the Secretary of the Treasury of obligations under this paragraph shall be treated as public debt transactions of the United States.

RESPONSIBILITY FOR COSTS FOR REMEDIAL ACTION

SEC. 9. (a) COSTS ASSOCIATED WITH URANIUM AND THORIUM PROCESSING ACTIVITIES BEFORE EFFECTIVE DATE.—The costs for reclamation, decommissioning, other remedial action, and long-term maintenance and monitoring activities, undertaken by the Secretary or the designee of the Secretary under section 3, associated with uranium and thorium processing activities before the effective date of this Act shall be shared by—

(1) the owners or licensees of pertinent active sites, as provided in subsection (c);

(2) the Federal Government, as provided in subsection (d); and

(3) persons using source material or special nuclear material for a civilian nuclear power reactor to generate electrical energy, as provided in subsection (e).

(b) CALCULATION OF COST FOR REMEDIAL ACTION FOR PROCESSING ACTIVITIES CONDUCTED BEFORE EFFECTIVE DATE.—

(1) The costs of reclamation, decommissioning, other remedial action, and long-term maintenance and monitoring activities that are attributable to milling operations before the effective date of this Act shall be the total costs multiplied by a fraction with:

(A) a numerator comprised of the total dry tons of tailings attributable to the site but generated prior to the effective date of this Act; and

(B) a denominator comprised of the total dry tons of tailings attributable to the site, ending on the date that the reclamation, decommissioning, or other remedial action is initiated.

(2) The Secretary may promulgate regulations relating to the calculation of the fractions specified in paragraph (1), and may require reasonable information to be submitted by the owners or licensees of the uranium or thorium processing sites concerning such calculations.

(c) SHARE OF COSTS OF OWNERS OR LICENSEES.—

(1) For uranium or thorium processing sites initially licensed before the effective date of this Act, the licensee or owner of each uranium or thorium site for which reclamation, decommissioning, other remedial action, or long-term maintenance and monitoring is performed by the Secretary or the designee of the Secretary shall pay to the Treasury of the United States, to be deposited in the Tailings Fund, an amount equal to—

(A) 15 percent of the cost determined under subsection (b); and

(B) 100 percent of the cost of such activities associated with uranium or thorium milling activities on or after the effective date of this Act.

(2) For uranium or thorium processing sites initially licensed on or after the effective date of this Act, and for which the Secretary or the designee of the Secretary performs reclamation, decommissioning, other remedial action, or long-term maintenance and monitoring, the owner or licensee of such uranium of thorium processing site shall pay to the Treasury of the United States, to be deposited in the Tailings Fund, an amount equal to 100 percent of the cost for such activities.

(3) All payments by licensees or owners under this section shall be made on an annual basis for reclamation, decommissioning and remedial action undertaken during each preceding one-year period beginning on the effective date of this Act, in accordance with regulations promulgated by the Secretary. Payments by licensees or owners for long-term maintenance and monitoring shall be paid no later than the date on which reclamation and decommissioning of the active site is completed.

(d) SHARE OF COSTS OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT.—In recognition that some active sites contain tailings which have resulted from ore processing to extract uranium and thorium under contract with the United States for use primarily in defense programs, the Federal Government shall pay into the Tailings Fund an amount equal to 30 percent of the costs, determined under subsection (b), incurred during each one-year period beginning on the effective date of this Act for reclamation, decommissioning, other remedial action, and long-term maintenance and monitoring activities undertaken by the Secretary or the designee of the Secretary associated with uranium or thorium processing activities prior to the effective date of this Act.

(e) SHARE OF COSTS OF UTILITIES.—

(1) Persons using source material or special nuclear material for a civilian nuclear power reactor to generate electrical energy shall enter into agreements with the Secretary to pay a fee, as provided in paragraph (2), to offset 55 percent of the costs, determined under subsection (b), incurred during each one-year period beginning on the effective date of this Act, for reclamation, decommissioning, other remedial action, and long-term maintenance and monitoring activities undertaken by the Secretary or the designee of the Secretary associated with uranium or thorium processing activities prior to the effective date of this Act.

(2) For electricity generated by a civilian nuclear power reactor and sold on or after the effective date of this Act, the fee described in paragraph (1) shall be equal to 0.15 mil per kilowatt hour. Such fee shall be paid to the Treasury of the United States and shall be deposited in the Tailings Fund.

(3)(A) Not later than 120 days after the effective date of this Act the Secretary shall establish procedures for the collection and payment of the fee established by paragraph (1). The Secretary shall annually review the amount of such fee to evalaute whether collection of the fee, contribution by the owner or licensee, and the payments of the United States, will provide sufficient revenues to offset the costs experienced and expected for reclamation, decommissioning, other remedial action, and long-term maintenance and monitoring activities undertaken by the Secretary or the designee of the Secretary. In the event the Secretary determines that either insufficient or excess revenues are being collected, the Secretary shall, in order to recover the costs incurred by the Federal Government for reclamation, decommissioning, other remedial action, and long-term maintenance and monitoring, propose an adjustment to the fee established in paragraph (1) to ensure full funding. The Secretary shall immediately transmit this proposal for such an adjustment to the Congress. The adjustment to the fee proposed by the Secretary shall be effective after a period of 120 days of continuous session of the Congress have elapsed following the receipt of such transmittal unless during such 120-day period there is enacted into law a joint resolution disapproving such adjustment.

(B) For purposes of the 120-day period described in subparagraph (A)—

(i) continuity of session of the Congress is broken only by an adjournment sine die; and

(ii) the days on which either House is not in session because of an adjournment of more than 3 days to a day certain are excluded in the computation of the 120-day period.

(4)(A) The Commission shall not issue or renew a license to any person to use a utilization or production facility under the authority of section 103 of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954 (42 U.S.C. 2133) or to use special nuclear material at such a facility unless such person has entered into an agreement with the Secretary under this section.

(B) The Commission, as it determines necessary or appropriate, may require as a condition to the issuance or renewal of a license under section 103 of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954 (42 U.S.C. 2133), or a license for special nuclear material under section 53 of such Act, that the applicant for such license shall have entered into an agreement with the Secretary for the disposal of byproduct material.

(f) LIMITATION ON FINANCIAL OBLIGATION OF ACTIVE SITE OWNERS AND UTILITIES.—Except for the payment of the fee and contributions provided in this section, the Federal Government may not impose any further financial obligation on persons using source material or special nuclear material for a civilian nuclear power reactor to generate electrical energy, or on owners or licensees of uranium or thorium processing sites, for reclamation, decommissioning, other remedial action or long-term maintenance and monitoring associated with active sites.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 10. FOR PURPOSES OF THIS ACT—

(1) the terms "active uranium or thorium processing site" and "active site" mean—

(A) any uranium or thorium processing site, including the mill, containing byproduct material for which a license (issued by the Nuclear Regulatory Commission or its predecessor agency under the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, or by a State as permitted under section 274 of such Act (42 U.S.C. 2021)) for the production at such site of any uranium or thorium derived from ore—

(i) is in effect on January 1, 1978;

(ii) is issued or renewed after January 1, 1978; or

(iii) for which an application for renewal or issuance is pending on, or after, January 1, 1978; and

(B) any other real property or improvement on such real property that—

(i) is in the vicinity of such site; and

(ii) is determined by the Secretary, in consultation with the Commission, to be contaminated with residual byproduct material.

(2) The term Administrator means the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency.

(3) The term "byproduct material" has the meaning given such term in section 11e. (2) of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954 (42 U.S.C. 2014(e)(2)).

(4) The term "civilian nuclear power reactor" means any civilian nuclear powerplant required to be licensed under section 103 or section 104 of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954 (42 U.S.C. 2133).

(5) The term "Commission" means the Nuclear Regulatory Commission.

(6) The term "Indian tribe" means any tribe, band, clan, group, pueblo, or community of Indians recognized as eligible for services provided by the Secretary of the Interior to Indians.

(7) The term "Secretary" means the Secretary of Energy.

(8) The terms "source material" and "special nuclear material" have the meanings given such terms in section 11 of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954 (42 U.S.C. 2014).

(9) The term "tailings" means the wastes produced by the extraction or concentration of uranium or thorium from any ore processed primarily for its source material content.

(10) The term "Tailings Fund" means the Uranium Mill Tailings Fund established in section 8.

TECHNICAL AND CONFORMING AMENDMENTS TO THE ATOMIC ENERGY ACT OF 1954

SEC. 11. (a) OWNERSHIP AND CUSTODY OF CERTAIN BYPRODUCT MATERIAL AND DISPOSAL SITES.—

(1) Section 83a. (1) of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954 (42 U.S.C. 2113(a)(1)) is amended by inserting before "the licensee" the following: "the Secretary of Energy will be in a position to, or, as appropriate,".

(2) Section 83(b)(5) of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954 (42 U.S.C. 2113(b)(5)) is amended by striking out the last sentence.

AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 12. There is authorized to be appropriated, effective on October 1, 1985, to the Uranium Mill Tailings Fund, $290,000,000, to remain available until expended.

LIMITATION ON SPENDING AUTHORITY

SEC. 13. The authority under this Act to incur indebtedness, or enter into contracts, obligating amounts to be expended by the Federal Government shall be effective for any fiscal year only to such extent or in such amounts as are provided in advance by appropriation Acts.

EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 14. The provisions of and amendments made by this Act shall become effective upon the expiration of the 60-day period following the date of enactment of this Act.●

● Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I am pleased today to join with my good friend and colleague from New Mexico, Senator DOMENICI, in introducing the Uranium Mill Tailings Reclamation Act of 1985. The purpose of this legislation is to establish a comprehensive and equitable financing mechanism for the reclamation of tailings at active uranium and thorium processing sites regulated under title II of the Uranium Mill Tailings Radiation Control Act of 1978.

In 1978, when Congress passed this act, commonly referred to as UMTRCA, it established what was then believed by many to be a comprehensive program for the cleanup and stabilization of uranium and thorium mill tailings, both at sites that had been abandoned—the so-called inactive sites—as well as at sites that were still active.

For the active sites, the Environmental Protection Agency was directed to establish "generally applicable environmental standards" for both the radiological and nonradiological hazards of mill tailings. The Nuclear Regulatory Commission, in turn, was then to establish the detailed regulatory requirements to be met in cleaning up and stabilizing the tailings piles, and to conform those regulations to EPA's general standards. Following promulgation of the detailed regulatory requirements, the NRC was then to proceed with implementation of the program at individual sites.

Today, more than 6 years after the passage of UMTRCA, the program is in a shambles. EPS's standards were over 3 years late, and the standards that were adopted in late 1983 are widely viewed as simply inappropriate for the low-toxicity, high-volume mill tailings wastes for which EPA was to promulgate standards under UMTRCA. My own State of Wyoming, for example—which has been a leader in this Nation in the protection of its scarce ground water supplies—views the EPA standards as a myopic attempt to apply the EPA solid-waste standards for high-toxicity, low-volume chemical wastes to a type of waste—mill tailings—that is fundamentally different. As a result, the EPA approach simply makes no sense at all.

Beyond that, EPA has gone far beyond its charge under UMTRCA to promulgate "generally applicable environmental standards" for mill tailings piles and, instead, is seeking to become deeply involved in establishing and implementing detailed regulatory requirements for mill tailings—a responsibility that UMTRCA conferred exclusively on the NRC.

As a result of the questionable technical and jurisdictional basis for the EPA standards, the program is now mired in controversy.

Both the industry and the environmentalists have challenged the EPA standards in court; the NRC and EPA are firing salvos back and forth over who has jurisdiction over what; in the meantime, the NRC is trying to move forward with implementation of the EPA standards without first conforming its regulations to those standards; and, throughout all of this, the statutorily-mandated conforming process will not be complete for at least 3 more years. Only then—10 years after UMTRCA was first passed—will the necessary regulations be in place to move forward with any cleanup or stabilization.

I can hardly imagine that anyone believed, back in 1978, that it would be 10 years before we had the necessary regulations on the books to move forward with cleanup and stabilization of mill tailings piles. But that is where we are today. And in the intervening years, the estimates of the cost of cleanup and stabilization have skyrocketed.

More importantly, no one in the uranium business envisioned, back in 1978 when UMTRCA was passed, that the regulatory requirements that would subsequently be imposed would be delayed by almost 10 years by a turf-struggle between two agencies here in Washington; and that, when promulgated, the EPA standards would consist of merely slapping requirements on the uranium companies that were initially adopted for a wholly different purpose and would prove to be inappropriate and unnecessary costly for the low-toxicity, high-volume uranium wastes.

As a result, these costs of doing business were not, in many instances, assumed by the uranium companies in marketing their product—yellowcake—to utility customers.

The legislation that my colleague from New Mexico and I are introducing today is designed to get the mill tailings cleanup program back on track, by establishing a comprehensive, equitable, and reliable mechanism to pay for the cleanup and stabilization program. After witnessing years of delay and infighting, I am now convinced that the approach reflected in this legislation is the only way that we can expect to move forward with cleanup and stabilization in a fashion that will ensure that the job will get done—and in a timely manner—now that we have wasted years of delay on this effort.

This legislation would establish a comprehensive cost sharing approach to fund the cleanup and stabilization of all existing tailings, and related areas and facilities, subject to the requirements of title II of UMTRCA.

The cost would be divided among the nuclear utilities, the uranium companies, and the Federal Government. The nuclear utilities would contribute 55 percent of the costs, through a fee of 0.15 mil per kilowatthour on electricity generated by commercial nuclear power plants; the uranium companies would contrbute 15 percent of the costs; and the Federal Government would contribute the remaining 30 percent, an amount roughly comparable to the proportion of tailings at these sites that resulted from the production of yellowcake by the uranium companies for the Federal Government's defense needs—the so-called "commingled tailings."

The actual cleanup would be conducted by the Department of Energy or, by mutual agreement, the State in which the site is located or the uranium company involved. All cleanup and stabilizatioin activity would be undertaken in accordance with all appropriate Federal and State requirements.

In summary, Mr. President, we have witnessed over 6 years of protracted and costly delay in implementation of the uranium mill tailings program, with the prospect for future delays on the immediate horizon. In the absence of firm congressional action to put this program back on track, we will, in all likelihood, be mired in the same controversies on the 10th anniversary of UMTRCA, with the comprehensive regulatory program envisioned by Congress back in 1978 delayed by 10 years, to the detriment of the public, the uranium companies, the States, the Federal agencies involved, and, in short, all who would like to see a reasonable, balanced cleanup and stabilization program move forward. For these reasons, Mr. President, I am joining with my colleague, Senator DOMENICI, today in introducing this legislation, and urge my other colleagues to support this effort.●

THE URANIUM MILL TAILINGS RECLAMATION ACT OF 1985

● Mr. BINGAMAN. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my distinguished colleague from New Mexico in introducing the Uranium Mill Tailings Reclamation Act of 1985. I believe this legislation addresses an important problem that has been of great concern to the residents of New Mexico.

This problem is providing the appropriate method and funding for the cleanup of uranium mill tailings. These tailings or waste residues from the processing of uranium ore are a potential radiation hazard, and contamination may be spread to surrounding areas by wind and water erosion if the tailings are not disposed of properly.

The Uranium Mill Tailings Radiation Control Act of 1978 provided funding and authority to the U.S. Department of Energy [DOE] to dispose of radioactive tailings at inactive uranium mill sites. Remedial action at the two inactive sites in New Mexico will be carried out under this legislation. However, the responsibility for disposal of tailings at active mill sites remained on the owner or operator of the site.

Currently there are five active or licensed uranium mill sites in New Mexico. There are in excess of 80 million tons of mill tailings at these five sites. Approximately 30 million tons at three of the sites were generated under the Atomic Energy Commission [AEC] Uranium Program. The tailings generated under the AEC Program are commingled with tailings generated to produce uranium for nuclear generation of electricity.

Aside from the environmental and health problems from such tailings piles, there is the economic problem. The DOE has estimated an average cost for control to meet the Federal standards for cleanup to be approximately $3.75 per ton of tailings. On this basis, costs for control of the five sites will range from about $5 million for the smallest site to about $115 million for the largest site. The estimated total cost for the five sites is approximately $300 million.

The uranium industry in New Mexico is in a serious state of decline. Four of the five licensed uranium mills have been placed on standby status and may not reopen. The fifth mill is expected to operate only for 1 or 2 years. The deteriorating financial condition of the uranium industry indicates the importance of providing assistance to meet the costs of tailings disposal.

The legislation we introduce today would establish a program within the Department of Energy for the expeditious cleanup of existing uranium mill tailings to be financed by uranium producers, 15 percent, nuclear utilities, 55 percent, and the Federal Government, 30 percent.

For new tailings produced after the enactment of this act, the costs would be negotiated between the producers and the nuclear utilities. The program would operate under the regulatory scheme established in the Uranium Mill Tailings Act. The Secretary of Energy is directed to undertake the program and may designate the State in which the site is located or the owner of the site to perform the remedial action. A fund is established to cover the costs of reclamation. The fund would be derived from annual payments from uranium producers, annual appropriations from the Federal Government, and from a fee placed on nuclear-generated electricity. The fee would be 0.15 mill per kilowatthour or less than a nickle in a consumer's monthly bill.

I strongly support the Federal Government and other users of uranium sharing the responsibility for disposal of these radioactive wastes. The Federal Government was the sole purchaser of uranium for many years. Over 30 percent of existing tailings nationwide are a result of the Government's purchases for its defense programs. For these reasons, the GAO in 1979 recommended that the Government share in these cleanup costs. This legislation would ensure that the Government meets its legitimate responsibility. The nuclear utilities were required by the Nuclear Waste Policy Act to pay 1 mill per kilowatthour for the cleanup of high-level wastes. This legislation levies only a 0.15 mill per kilowatthour charge. Of course, the uranium producers must also share in any cleanup cost.

It makes good sense to have the Federal Government work with the industry and the nuclear utilities in financing the proper disposal of uranium mill tailings.

I will do everything I can to ensure swift passage of this much needed legislation.●

S. 1005. A bill to amend the Davis-Bacon Act to modify the provisions of such act prescribing the minimum wages to be paid laborers, mechanics, and helpers employed on public construction projects, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

DAVIS-BACON REFORM

● Mr. NICKLES. Mr. President, today, along with Senators EAST, HAWKINS, HUMPHREY, LAXALT, THURMOND, DENTON, GRAMM, GOLDWATER, QUAYLE, and MATTINGLY, I am introducing legislation reforming the Davis-Bacon Act. If enacted these changes will put an end to the inflationary pressures that the act has had on construction wage rates that, until recently, were determined by Labor Department procedures directly contrary to the fundamental intent of the 1931 act—to protect local wage rates from predatory contractors paying their workers less than prevailing wages. Everyone in this body agrees, I suspect, with the proposition that Federal construction programs should not undercut local prevailing wage rates and practices.

Unfortunately the act has been administered over the years in a fashion designed to seek the highest wage rates and then require their payment on Federal and federally assisted projects spread over a wide geographic area. These high wage rates resulted from the use of the notorious 30 percent rule to identify the prevailing wage. Often these predetermined prevailing wages were then imported from urban areas to rural areas. Thus, construction practices and wage rates in many local areas, particularly rural communities, were not taken into account by the Labor Department in setting these predetermined prevailing wage requirements.

These DOL administrative practices, taken in their entirety, undercut the ability of local contractors to bid successfully on Davis-Bacon jobs. Local construction craftsmen suffered as a result of the inability of their employers to market their services to the Government. This intolerable situation was directly contrary to the intent of the Davis-Bacon Act.

As a result of these inflationary administrative practices, the General Accounting Office recommended repeal of the act in 1979. GAO is not alone. Contractor groups, taxpayer groups, and numerous others have called for repeal; so have the Wall Street Journal and the New York Times. The Carter administration conducted a study of Davis-Bacon by the Office of Federal Procurement Policy [OFPP] in 1979. This study was the first official study to call for significant reforms but, unfortunately, was ignored by the Carter Labor Department.

To its credit, the Reagan administration has identified these aforementioned problems with the act and has revised the Davis-Bacon regulations to alleviate those problems. Of course opponents did everything possible to stop them from being implemented. The Labor Department was sued by the construction unions when the new regulations were promulgated in May 1982. Federal District Court Judge Harold Greene enjoined all but one of the new regulations. The D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals reversed. In January 1984 the Supreme Court upheld the U.S. Court of Appeals decision. Essentially the courts held that the new regulations did indeed reflect congressional intent and were not a distortion of the act and that the Secretary of Labor was within his rights to implement these new regulations.

The legislation I am introducing today mirrors the essentials of the administration's regulatory changes. Additionally, it increases the threshold for Davis-Bacon coverage, currently $2,000, which of course cannot be done administratively. These reforms correct within the statute those problems identified by the GAO, the Office of Federal Procurement Policy, and numerous others. It will reduce the inflationary tendency of the act by setting wage levels that actually prevail in an area. Local contractors and construction craftsmen will thus be given the opportunity to bid on Federal and federally assisted jobs. These statutory changes clearly reflect the congressional intent of the original Davis-Bacon Act. The July 1983 decision of the U.S. Court of Appeals that upheld the new regulations discusses in great detail why these reforms are consistent with congressional intent at passage of the Davis-Bacon Act.

Briefly this legislation:

First, establishes a definition of prevailing rates based on identifying a majority—50 percent—of a job classification paid the identical rate. Failure to identify a majority will require a weighted average to establish the prevailing rate.

Second, bans the importation of urban wage data and rates into rural areas and vice versa.

Third, requires the DOL to recognize helper classifications in areas where they are a prevailing practice.

Fourth, increases the threshold application of Davis-Bacon from $2,000 to $1,000,000 thus allowing small contractors—and their employees—increased access to Government construction work consistent with all existing Federal labor and procurement standards.

The Congressional Budget Office estimates that these four changes will save almost $2.5 billion in outlays and $3.7 billion in budget authority from fiscal year 1986 through fiscal year 1990.

Their summary, by budget function, follows:

By Mr. BOSCHWITZ (for himself and Mr. DENTON):

S. 1007. A bill to amend title 38, United States Code, to direct the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to develop and carry out a pilot program to determine the most cost-effective methods of acquiring medical facilities to meet the needs of the Veterans' Administration and otherwise to promote additional health care for eligible veterans, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

VETERANS' HEALTH CARE PROMOTION ACT

● Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, today, along with my good friend and colleague from Alabama, Senator DENTON, I am introducing the Veterans' Health Care Promotion Act of 1985.

The roots of this legislation are long—stretching back to nearly 1980 when I became involved in trying to provide funds for a replacement hospital for the aged and outdated Minneapolis Veterans Hospital.

Those battles with the VA over its constantly changing priority list, and the parallel battles with certain local groups over the lack of need for a replacement facility because local hospital beds were unused, laid the groundwork for my continuing interests in veterans health care and the VA's construction process.

Mr. President, since those days in 1980 the VA has spent $2.7 billion on the construction of new or replacement medical facilities. This year the administration's budget calls for an additional $2.5 billion over the next 3 years. And this is really just the tip of the iceberg. CBO projects that $400 million will be needed over the next 5 years just to meet the new construction needs for nursing homes. However, if the VA attempts to retain its current level of providing nursing home beds, the costs would go up an additional $200 million.

Currently the VA provides 40 percent of the veterans nursing home beds, the State Home Program provides 20 percent, and the remaining 40 percent are contracted on an individual basis to non-VA nursing homes.

And in addition to nursing home spending, CBO estimates that the funds needed for the replacement or modernization of existing VA hospitals could cost as much as $2.9 billion.

Unfortunately, the VA's construction process is three to five times as expensive as the private sector. This means that while we are doing what we can to see that the veterans of this country are getting the health care they deserve, we are clearly not getting as much bang out of the buck as we could. And in this budget cutting climate we have to stretch each dollar as wisely and as far as we can. That is why I decided to introduce my legislation. I feel that if we can cut costs in the construction area, we can provide more beds, serve more veterans, and provide better overall health care for this Nation's veterans.

I realize that at first blush some may see my bill as somewhat controversial, and perhaps as a first step of some sort toward dismantling the Veterans' Administration health care system. But it's clearly not either of these. In fact I believe my bill gives us a unique opportunity to strengthen the VA health care system.

Mr. President, everyone involved with veterans and the VA knows the crunch is coming. The demographics of the aging veteran have been published in every major media forum. The VA also, to its credit, has tried to address and plan for the influx of aging veterans.

If the VA is right and the demand for VA health care triples by the year 2000—with patient load leaping from 4.5 million today to over 12 million—then there will be a tremendous strain on both the VA and its budget. Clearly, we want to be in a position to provide VA health care for as many eligible veterans as we can.

Therefore, we must realize that in order to pay for the care we have promised the veteran, we must develop more cost-effective methods of providing it. But we must provide it in such a way that we don't jeopardize the commitments we have made to our veterans. And we must also recognize that the VA's costs will normally be somewhat higher than the private sector because of the type of patients it serves and the dedicated mission it has been given. However, it is clear Congress and the VA must look at the options and alternatives available.

That is what the bill Senator DENTON and I are introducing today is designed to do. First, get the VA to look at other ways to provide care before simply building a new expensive facility. Second, the bill sets up four pilot projects that will allow the VA, Congress, and the veterans of this country a chance to see how these options work.

Basically this legislation does three things.

First, it requires that the VA's first option when developing plans for new or replacement medical facilities shall be to consider leasing or purchasing existing community facilities. The VA has the authority now to lease or acquire existing facilities, but it has never used it for either hospitals or nursing homes.

Second, sets up a pilot program to look at four different scenarios. The first would be a privately built, privately run nursing homes that the VA would contract eligible veterans to in a 5-year agreement. Veterans in my State of Minnesota support such a pilot project located in Grand Rapids, MI. In this case, a veteran would like to build a nursing home facility for vets and then run it with his staff.

The second would be a nursing home that was privately planned, designed, and built that would then be leased to the VA and run by the VA. This nursing home would then revert to the private sector when no longer needed by the VA.

The third would require the VA to purchase an existing medical facility. It seems that a perfect opportunity to exercise this option is available in Mobile, AL, where the VA can acquire a hospital for $25 million, and in fact the purchase option has been looked at by the VA and the local community. In contrast, the replacement Minneapolis hospital I fought so hard and successfully to get funded cost over $200 million.

The fourth option would be for the VA to simply lease an existing facility.

Third, the bill also requires the VA to report on the potential cost savings of increasing the number of nursing home beds contracted to community facilities. As I mentioned earlier, the VA has a 40-percent share of the veteran nursing home beds, as do community contracts. The bill asks the VA to look at increasing the community share to 60 percent or 75 percent.

Mr. President, this provision was included in the bill primarily because of a survey I mailed to over 60,000 Minnesota vets last summer asking for their views on how Congress should fund the number of nursing home beds that will be needed by the year 2000. The results were somewhat startling with 73.4 percent of the respondents saying that the VA should not build more nursing homes. Overall, the results reemphasized my belief that veterans are concerned both about available health care and cost-effective care.

I ask unanimous consent that the results of this survey be included in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the survey was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HEALTH CARE FOR THE AGING VET SURVEY RESULTS

[Based on results of 600 returned surveys]

SURVEY

I. How should nursing home sites be chosen? (Rank choices 1-4)

1. Number of Service-Connected Vets in an Area: 65 percent rank this as first or second choice.

2. Number of Veterans in Area Unable to Pay: 60.2 percent rank this as first or second choice.

3. Number of Vets as Percent of Population in Area: 35.7 percent pick as their first choice, but 53 percent have listed as third or last choice.

4. Distance From Existing Facility: 54 percent rank as third or last choice.

II. Should the VA build more nursing homes? 26.6 percent say Yes; 73.4 percent say No.

III. How should we "find" more nursing home beds?

1. Leasing Existing Facilities, Use VA Personnel: 77.4 percent chose as their first or second choice.

2. Leasing Wing of Existing Facility, Using VA personnel: 65.9 percent chose as first or second choice.

3. Use Community Facilities, Pay Per Diems: 45 percent chose as first or second choice.

4. Build More Nursing Homes: 65.8 percent chose as their last choice—only 24.3 percent chose as their first or second choice.

IV. Do you support contracting out of nursing home care? 64 percent said Yes; 27.2 percent said No; 8.7 percent didn't know.

Of those who responded 57 percent within 50 miles of an existing VA facility, 28.3 percent live more than 100 miles.

V. Should the VA devote more of its resources to programs like Adult Day Health Care—seeking to keep the vet out of a full-time facility?

Over 80 percent said that the VA should devote more of the resources.

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, I hope my colleagues will agree that the time is right to look at different ways to spend our VA construction money. The crunch is certainly coming. If we can get started now, maybe we can do more than just wring our hands when the time comes.

I also hope my colleagues will join me in working with the VA, veterans groups and the Veterans' Committee in working with this bill, perhaps improving it, and then seeing it made into law.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be entered in the RECORD at this time.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1007

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Veterans' Health Care Promotion Act of 1985".

SEC. 2. Section 5002 of title 38, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(d)(1) In developing plans for a new or replacement medical facility, the Administrator shall give first consideration to leasing or purchasing any existing medical facility that satisfies the requirements of paragraph (2) of this subsection.

"(2) A medical facility satisfies the requirements of this paragraph if—

"(A) the facility meets the needs of the Veterans' Administration or is adaptable to meet such needs at cost that does not exceed the cost of construction of a medical facility to meet such needs; and

"(B) the cost of operating the facility (after adaptation, if necessary) is not expected to exceed the cost of operating a new medical facility.".

SEC. 3. (a) For the purposes of this section, the term "medical facility" has the same meaning as provided in section 5001(3) of title 38, United States Code.

(b)(1) The Administrator of Veterans' Affairs shall carry out a pilot program to determine the most cost-effective method or methods of acquiring medical facilities for the Veterans' Administration. Under the pilot program, the Administrator shall acquire medical facilities using the methods set out in subsection (c).

(2) Not later than January 1, 1987, the Administrator shall enter into the contracts required by subsection (c) to carry out the pilot program. The Administrator shall carry out the program for such period, ending not less than 5 years after such date, as the Administrator determines to be appropriate.

(c)(1) The Administrator of Veterans' Affairs shall enter into a contract with an appropriate entity to construct and operate a nursing home for the Veterans' Administration. Under the contract, the Veterans' Administration shall furnish the funds for construction of the nursing home. The contract shall provide that the contractor shall operate the nursing home for 5 years after completing the construction and that the Administrator may renew the contract for an additional term not to exceed 5 years. The contract shall include a provision that the Veterans' Administration shall refer a sufficient number of eligible veterans who require nursing home care to the nursing home to assure an 80 percent occupancy rate for the nursing home for the term of the contract. All rights, title, and interest in the nursing home constructed under a contract entered into pursuant to this paragraph shall vest in the United States.

(2) The Administrator shall enter into a contract with an appropriate entity to plan for, design, and construct a medical facility for the Veterans' Administration and to lease or sell the facility to the Veterans' Administration as the Administrator may direct. The Veterans' Administration shall operate the medical facility using Veterans' Administration employees.

(3)(A) The administrator shall acquire two existing medical facilities as provided in subparagraph (B). The Veterans' Adminstration shall operate the medical facilities using Veterans' Administration employees.

(B) In carrying out subparagraph (A), the Administrator shall—

(i) purchase one medical facility that is located in an urban area and that is suitable for furnishing both hospital and nursing home services; and

(ii) lease one medical facility that is located in an urban area.

(d) The Administrator shall transmit to the Committees on Veterans' Affairs of the Senate and the House of Representatives an annual report on the administration of the pilot program and a final report promptly after the termination of the pilot program.

SEC. 4. Not later than 90 days after the date of enactment of this Act, the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs shall transmit to the Committees on Veterans' Affairs of the Senate and the House of Representatives a report on (1) the extent to which the Veterans' Administration furnishes respite care to elderly veterans and to disabled veterans and (2) the Veterans' Administration plans for furnishing such care to such veterans in the future. The Administrator shall include in the report an estimate of cost savings likely to result from increasing the allocation of Veterans' Administration resources to respite care and other adult day health care and decreasing the allocation of such resources to long-term institutional care.

SEC. 5. (a) Not later than 90 days after the date of enactment of this Act, the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs shall transmit to the Committees on Veterans' Affairs of the Senate and the House of Representatives an estimate of the cost of increasing the number of community-based nursing home beds available to the Veterans' Administration by 50 percent and an estimate of the cost of increasing the number of community-based nursing home beds available to the Veterans' Administration by 75 percent. The estimates shall specify the cost savings likely to result from reduced construction of medical facilities for the Veterans' Administration and a comparison of the cost per patient per day for care furnished in medical facilities owned by the United States and operated by the Veterans' Administration and the cost per patient per day for care furnished in other medical facilities under the jurisdiction of the administrator.

(b) The Administrator of Veterans' Affairs is encouraged to place, through increased use of his authority to contract for medical facilities, as many eligible veterans as practicable in nursing homes located in the veterans' communities in the case of eligible veterans residing in areas other than urban areas.

SEC. 6. (a) The Administrator of Veterans' Affairs shall use not more than $25,000,000 of the working reserve funds available to the Veterans' Administration for fiscal year 1986 to purchase an urban medical facility for the purpose of carrying out section 3(c)(3)(B)(i).

(b) The President shall include in the budget submitted to the Congress under section 1105(a) of title 31, United States Code, for fiscal year 1987, a statement of the estimated expenditures and proposed appropriations necessary to carry out the pilot program required by section 3 in such fiscal year. The statement shall include the estimated expenditures and proposed appropriations necessary—

(1) to acquire medical facilities as provided in section 3(b) (other than estimated expenditures for which working reserve funds are required to be used as provided in subsection (a) of this section) and to renovate such facilities, if necessary; and

(2) to pay the personnel and other costs of operating the facilities.

(c) The Administrator shall achieve savings in the costs of operating medical facilities under the jurisdiction of the Administrator during fiscal year 1987 in a total amount sufficient to offset the personnel and other operating costs referred to in clause (2) of the second sentence of subsection (b). The Administrator shall achieve the cost savings by reallocating resources of the Veterans' Administration to the medical facilities referred to in subsection (b) from other medical facilities under the jurisdiction of the Administrator that have a surplus of beds, are underutilized, or are converted to perform new missions.●

● Mr. DENTON. Mr. President, I am pleased to join with my colleague from Minnesota, Senator BOSCHWITZ, to introduce legislation to provide for the "Veterans' Health Care Promotion Act of 1985." The legislation is particularly appropriate at a time when we are concerned about providing adequate medical care for our veterans, both nursing homes and hospitals, but face an increasing necessity to reduce the Federal budget.

For each of the 5 years that I have been a member of the Committee on Veterans Affairs, the VA has requested large sums of money to build new hospitals to serve our veterans. The costs of the new hospitals are substantial, and we see with some frequency the construction of large, modern, expensive facilities in localities where it is difficult to justify the size and the cost.

I have taken a quick look at the costs of recently activated VA hospital facilities, and I think that it is kind of interesting. For 10 hospitals activated between 1973 and 1984, ranging in size from 205 beds to 1,305 beds, the costs per bed of the total project, in 1984 dollars, ranged from a low of $95,000 to a high of $313,000. The average cost per bed for the 5,951 beds built with $1,117 million (1984 dollars) was about $188,000.

I must say, Mr. President, that I have not noticed any inclination on the part of the Veterans' Administration to deal with that problem by finding less expensive or more cost-effective ways to provide necessary new or replacement beds. Indeed, the VA takes pride in the fact that it has not in its history acquired existing hospitals—other than its initial taking over of existing military hospitals—and that it builds new facilities of the most modern and, I must say, most expensive kind.

Everyone who has looked at the problem says that if the VA is going to continue to add hospitals, it needs to find a less expensive way to do it. The Congressional Budget Office, the Office of Management and Budget, and the VA itself have all said that the VA may well have to, or should, consider the lease or purchase of existing hospital facilities. Yet I have yet to see any action from the VA to explore or implement that concept.

The same general situation applies to nursing homes, which are of increasing importance as our veterans population grows older. The demographics tell us that we do face a problem with the massive population of World War II veterans who are reaching the point where they will need increased access to both nursing home and hospital care.

The VA already has the authority to purchase or lease existing medical facilities, which includes nursing homes as well as hospitals, but has not yet done so, and has not shown an active interest in exploring the possibility. That is one reason that I believe that the pilot program provided by the bill will be of great value.

The problem has been brought home to me by a situation in my State that seems to provide an unexcelled opportunity.

As background, it is important to understand that the VA planning process for the medical district that includes Alabama, the Florida Panhandle, and southeastern Mississippi has for several years provided for the construction of a new VA hospital, in the 1990's, to serve the veterans located in the Florida Panhandle, south Alabama, and a small portion of Georgia. The new hospital is, however, only in the long-range plan, and the VA has not yet gotten to the point of including it in its actual construction plan.

We are, therefore, talking about an expensive new hospital to be built at some future time when costs will be higher and the budget tighter than it is now. In the meanwhile, an identified need goes unsatisfied, and the veterans and other interested parties can only hope that current plans ultimately come to fruition.

It is, nonetheless, clear that the VA has accepted the need for a new hospital in the region.

Last year, and by coincidence, a very fine private hospital in Mobile, AL—Providence Hospital—became available because its owners and operators, the Sisters of Mercy, are building a new hospital in a different part of town. They are not building a new hospital because there is anything wrong with the old one, large parts of which are new and all of which is well maintained. They are building because of a perception that their service mission required a different location.

The veterans in the area saw the availability of Providence as a boon to address a situation in which it was clear that the VA itself saw the need for a new hospital but in which that new hospital would be many years in the making and cost a great deal of money. They developed the view that the VA, the taxpayers, and the veterans would be better served if the VA acquired Providence as a VA facility rather than building a new hospital.

There were some additional considerations that were involved in the decision. Providence Hospital is relatively large, with 349 acute care beds, and has an adjacent 126-bed school of nursing which could be used for a veterans' nursing home. There are no nursing home beds currently available in south Alabama. The grounds are about 15,3 acres, with 1,000 paved parking spaces. There is a residence with space to house 13 employees. The hospital has the most modern facilities and equipment, all of which are available for purchase. In addition, the hospital could easily be a very good tertiary care facility because of its existing capabilities and the possibility of affiliating with a good medical school in Mobile. And the price is right, about $24 million.

I repeat, about $24 million. That is not much more than the cost for the design—just the design—of a new hospital now underway in a major city in another part of the country. As someone remarked the other day, this is the best deal around.

The veterans approached me with their idea. I confess that I was relatively cool to it at first because it looked too good to be true. Nonetheless, I asked the VA to take a look at the hospital to see whether, in physical terms, it would be usable.

The VA agreed to take a look at Providence, and did so with a professional team from the Office of Construction in the Department of Medicine and Surgery. Let me quote a couple of statements from the conclusions of its report, over the signature of the Director, Facility Planning Service, Department of Medicine and Surgery:

> The VA team concluded that the Providence Hospital is well maintained and in generally good condition. The newest construction is in excellent condition . . . It is the team's belief that if a programmatic determination were made to establish a VA medical center in Mobile, the Providence Hospital could be adapted to serve in this role. A detailed analysis would be needed to determine the cost of modifying Providence and thus the true costs of acquisition.

That's the VA's own people speaking, Mr. President. It struck me, and everyone else who has read the report, as a pretty good conclusion. What it meant, of course, was that there was nothing inherent to the hospital and its facilities that militated against its possible conversion to a VA facility.

In addition, the chairman of the Veterans' Affairs Committee in the other body asked one of his senior people to look at the situation. That look, by an experienced and knowledgeable individual, suggested that "the matter be further pursued with the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs," with some additional recommendations, and I quote in part:

> . . . the Administrator be urged to give serious consideration to the acquisition of Providence Hospital, Mobile, AL.

The report went on to say that if the VA wants to put a hospital in that region and does not want to use Providence, it should be made to show in detail why Providence is not suitable or economical, and to show that staffing and quality of care would be as easily done and as good elsewhere as it would be in Mobile.

That position seems pretty strong to me, and certainly suggests that the matter should be looked at fully and carefully.

I won't go into detail with all the other arguments for this particular way of addressing the needs of the veterans in that part of the country. I will say, however, that the merits of the case seem so compelling to me that I would support a close look at the situation no matter where it might be found, anywhere in the country.

Yet the VA cannot seem to get very interested in the problem. There are some reasons for that, although they do not seem to me to be compelling when one looks at the costs involved and the potential savings.

If we use an average cost per bed for a new hospital in 1984 dollars, which the VA has given as about $300,000 per bed in this location, a 225-bed new hospital to serve the veterans in the region would cost something like $67.5 million. I doubt that there are very many of us who do not expect that the cost would increase substantially, in both dollar and real terms, by the time that the VA gets around to building that hospital, if it gets around to it at all.

By contrast, Providence could be bought as is, and fully equipped, for something like $25 million. With 349 beds, the cost per bed would be $71,500. Even if we assume that it might cost, say, $15 million—and I seriously doubt that it would cost anything like that—to convert the facility to VA standards and usage patterns, the cost per bed is only $115,000, or about one-third of the estimated cost that we might expect for new construction. And there is a lot of other stuff that comes free for that price, such as a facility that would serve well as a nursing home.

In other words, we could save a minimum of $25 or $30 million over the total cost of new construction, get more beds and a lot of other things in the bargain, and have an operating hospital several years sooner. After all, it takes something like 4 to 8 years from initial funding to activation of a hospital.

I do not deny that there are costs involved in saving money in this instance. There would have to be readjustments in hospital service areas, the location in the region may not be ideal—although it is pretty good—and the VA would have to wrench itself out of its traditional pattern of providing hospitals only through new construction.

Nonetheless, the monetary savings would be substantial, and our veterans would benefit greatly. And that's what it is all about.

The bill, Mr. President, provides in section 3 for four pilot projects, each of a different nature and each innovative. One of those is the purchase of an existing urban medical facility that can furnish both hospital and nursing home services. Senator BOSCHWITZ and I had Providence Hospital in Mobile specifically in mind when we drafted that provision.

Mr. President, I believe that our veterans, our taxpayers, and our country will be well served by the bill that Senator BOSCHWITZ and I propose. I know that my colleague has encountered somewhat the same situation in his State as I have in mine, a situation in which there is an opportunity to provide service to veterans in an innovative way that promises reduced cost. I commend him for his initiative in drafting the bill, and I appreciate his courtesy and cooperation in working with me to develop it further.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to support the bill. I believe that the pilot program for which it provides will be successful, and that it will set us on a course that will benefit veterans in every State throughout our country. It will demonstrate that we can provide effective and efficient service to our veterans by the use of innovative approaches to facilities. Moreover, I believe that the VA will find the experience so congenial that it will take the initiative in further acquisition of facilities, whether nursing homes, hospitals, or replacements for current VA facilities when necessary.●

By Mr. HART:

S. 1008. A bill to provide for a demonstration program in which a limited number of States would be permitted to provide unemployment compensation to individuals for the purpose of funding self-employment; to the Committee on Finance.

SELF-EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITY ACT

● Mr. HART. Mr. President, today I am introducing the Self-Employment Opportunity Act of 1985. This legislation will encourage the development of entrepreneurial talent and the creation of new jobs in the areas of our country that are suffering dislocations as a result of our economic transition. This Nation has experienced massive layoffs in many of our traditional manufacturing industries, and the noninflationary rate of unemployment continues to hover at 7 percent. Mr. President, we must examine new programs to enable unemployed workers to become, once again, productive members of our economy.

The Self-Employment Opportunity Act will examine one such exciting program. Currently, recipients of unemployment compensation are prohibited from engaging in self-employment activity due to State and Federal requirements relating to availability for work or refusal to accept suitable work. Under the legislation, 5 to 10 States will enter into an agreement with the Secretary of Labor to permit a limited number of unemployment compensation recipients to receive their benefits while starting a new business. The States would be given flexibility in establishing guidelines for their self-employment programs. The results of these pilot programs will be carefully evaluated by the Secretary of Labor at the completion of the 4-year demonstration project.

The dilemma posed by long-term structural unemployment challenges us to rethink the notion that the unemployment compensation system exists only to provide temporary income support. We must update a system that operates solely to provide support payments and prohibits the unemployed worker from taking steps to return to the ranks of the employed by receiving essential, retraining or attempting self-employment.

Britain and France initiated programs, now adopted in several European nations, that permit unemployed workers to use their benefits while establishing a small business. The French program allows unemployment compensation recipients to receive their first 6 months of benefits in a lump sum, for the intitial capitalization of their business. The British scheme permits unemployment recipients to receive regular weekly unemployment benefits during a business startup period.

Results of data gathered on the British scheme, a program similar to that proposed in this bill, indicate that 88 percent of firms survive the first crucial year of operation. These firms created an average of 1.7 jobs per company. As the firms become stable and profitable, the taxes they contribute increase government revenues.

Such programs demonstrate that entrepreneurial ability is not unique to MBA graduates or Ph.D.'s in computer engineering. But, every potential entrepreneur requires, at a minimum, a means for livelihood during the startup phase of an enterprise.

A Federal Government policy that allows the provision of unemployment compensation benefits to struggling entrepreneurs can be effectively combined with State, local, and private sector assistance. Under the bill, each State established essential guidelines for choosing up to 5 percent of its unemployment compensation recipients as participants in the program. The States monitor their progress and provide the kinds of assistance now entrepreneurs require to succeed.

Most of the businesses established under this program, of course, will not be large-scale capital ventures. But the opportunity provided to unemployed workers under this scheme to create jobs for themselves—to operate a small restaurant, a day care program at home or an automobile repair business—will offer them renewed hope, motivation, and pride.

The program established by the Self-Employment Opportunity Act, even if established throughout the Nation at a future time, represents only a small part of what must be a comprehensive strategy to deal with the critical problem of long-term, structural unemployment. Our Nation must search for innovative solutions to the problems created by an economy that is experiencing a massive shift in its employment base. To create an unemployment compensation system that offers hope rather than despair to our jobless workers, we must experiment with creative approaches to enable them to emerge as self-sufficient contributors to a productive national economy.●

AMENDMENTS SUBMITTED

DOLE (AND DOMENICI) AMENDMENT NO. 37

Mr. DOLE (for himself and Mr. DOMENICI) proposed an amendment to the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 32) setting forth the congressional budget for the U.S. Government for the fiscal years 1986, 1987, and 1988 and revising the congressional budget for the U.S. Government for the fiscal year 1985; as follows:

Strike all after the resolving clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That the Congress hereby determines and declares that the concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1985 is revised and replaced, the first concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1986 is established, and the appropriate budgetary levels for fiscal years 1987 and 1988 are set forth.

(a) The following budgetary levels are appropriate for the fiscal years beginning on October 1, 1984, October 1, 1985, October 1, 1986, and October 1, 1987:

(1) The recommended levels of Federal revenues are as follows:

Fiscal year 1985: $736,200,000,000.
Fiscal year 1986: $793,800,000,000.
Fiscal year 1987: $866,600,000,000.
Fiscal year 1988: $956,200,000,000.

and the amounts by which the aggregate levels of Federal revenues should be increased are as follows:

Fiscal year 1985: $0.
Fiscal year 1986: $1,100,000,000.
Fiscal year 1987: $2,300,000,000.
Fiscal year 1988: $3,700,000,000.

and the amounts for Federal Insurance Contributions Act revenues for hospital insurance within the recommended levels of Federal revenues are as follows:

Fiscal year 1985: $44,800,000,000.
Fiscal year 1986: $51,000,000,000.

APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 3. (a) It shall not be in order to consider any measure making appropriations in the Senate or House of Representatives, if the enactment of such bill or resolution, as recommended by the respective Committee on Appropriations, would cause the aggregate total budget authority for function 050, National Defense, to exceed $303,200,000,000 in fiscal year 1986; aggregate total budget authority to exceed $324,100,000,000 in fiscal year 1987; and aggregate total budget authority to exceed $347,600,000,000 in fiscal year 1988.

(b) It shall not be in order to consider any measure making appropriations in the Senate or House of Representatives, if the enactment of such bill or resolution, as recommended by the respective Committee on Appropriations, would cause the aggregate total budget authority for nondefense discretionary activities to exceed $136,800,000,000 in fiscal year 1986; aggregate total budget authority to exceed $140,600,000,000 in fiscal year 1987; and aggregate budget authority to exceed $145,600,000,000 in fiscal year 1988.

(c) The provisions of subsection (a) or (b) of this section may be waived or suspended in the Senate by a majority vote of the Members voting, a quorum being present, or by unanimous consent of the Senate.

MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

SEC. 4. If the Congress has not completed action by October 1, 1985, on the concurrent resolution on the budget required to be reported under section 310(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 for fiscal year 1986, then, for purposes of section 311 of such Act, this concurrent resolution shall be deemed to be the concurrent resolution required to be reported under section 310 of such Act.

SEC. 5. It shall not be in order in the House of Representatives or the Senate during fiscal years 1986 and 1987 to consider any bill, resolution, or amendment, except proposed legislation reported in response to reconciliation instructions contained in this resolution, authorizing new direct loan obligations or new loan guarantee commitments unless that bill, resolution, or amendment also provides that the authority to make or guarantee such loans shall be effective only to such extent and in such amounts as are contained in appropriation acts.

SEC. 6. It is the sense of the Congress that the previous distinction between "unified budget" and "off-budget" spending be ended, and that budget authority and outlays for the so-called "off-budget" agencies be included in the budget totals.

SEC. 7. (a) The Senate finds that—

(1) the existing tax structure of the United States distorts economic activity, leading to an inefficient use of national resources and a weakening of our domestic economic vitality and competitive posture in international markets;

(2) the relative tax burdens among various taxpayer categories are manifestly unfair insofar as they arise from differences in the capabilities of taxpayers to take advantage of complicated tax laws;

(3) the ability of the Federal Government to plan and conduct rational fiscal policy is frustrated by elaborate schemes to avoid taxation and the unintended effects of tax incentives and penalties;

(4) progressive erosion of voluntary compliance threatens the fiscal integrity of our public finances and the confidence of our citizens in the Federal Government's capacity to govern; and

(5) a number of plans, each designed to simplify and reform the Tax Code, have been before the Congress for a time sufficient to allow for extensive analysis and evaluation.

(b) It is therefore the sense of the Senate that tax reform should be adopted as soon as possible, and that it should incorporate the following principles and objectives:

(1) efficiency and responsiveness to market conditions in the economic activities of American businesses and consumers;

(2) simplicity of structure and lower marginal tax rates;

(3) a fair and equitable distribution of the tax burden among all taxpayers, with relief for those below the poverty level, and incentives to bring them into the work force;

(4) a broader tax base, with deductions essential to avoid genuine hardship or to protect the economic security of the American people; and

(5) increased incentives for work, saving, and investment.

SEC. 9. It is the sense of the Senate that because the Senate requires timely reporting of legislative action on spending bills, and because the Senate requires continual control over the budget, the Director of the Congressional Budget Office shall issue a weekly report during periods when the Senate is in session detailing and tabulating the progress of congressional action on bills and resolutions providing new budget authority and changing revenues and the public debt for a fiscal year, including, but not limited to the requirements set forth in Public Law 93-344, section 308(b).

NOTICES OF HEARINGS

Mr. NICKLES. Mr. President, for the information of the Senate and the public, I am announcing the scheduling of public hearings before the Subcommittee on Energy Regulation and Conservation of the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

On Tuesday, May 14, 1985, beginning at 9:30 a.m., in room SD-366 of the Dirksen Senate Office Building, the subcommittee will hold an oversight hearing on automobile fuel economy standards.

On Tuesday, June 4, 1985, beginning at 9:30 a.m., in room SD-366 of the Dirksen Senate Office Building, the subcommittee will hold an oversight hearing on the impact of imported petroleum products on the domestic petroleum industry.

On Tuesday, June 18, 1985, beginning at 9:30 a.m., in room SD-366 of the Dirksen Senate Office Building, the subcommittee will hold an oversight hearing on the current state of and the factors affecting the natural gas market.

Those wishing to present oral testimony or submit written statements for the hearing record should write to the Honorable Don Nickles, chairman, Subcommittee on Energy Regulation and Conservation, Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC 20510.

You may contact the following committee staff at the above address for further information regarding these hearings: May 14, 1985, hearing on automobile fuel economy standards—Ms. Faye Johnson (202-224-2366); June 4, 1985, hearing on impact of imported petroleum products on the domestic petroleum industry—Ms. Elizabeth Baldwin (202-224-5205); and June 18, 1985, hearing on the current state of and the factors affecting the natural gas market—Ms. Elizabeth Baldwin (202-224-5205).

SELECT COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. President, I would like to announce for the information of the public that the Select Committee on Indian Affairs will hold a markup on S. 277, a bill to reauthorize and amend the Indian Health Care Improvement Act, and for other purposes. The markup will be held on May 2, 1985, commencing at 10 a.m., in room 342 of the Dirksen Senate Office Building.

Those wishing to obtain additional information should contact Peter S. Taylor, staff director, or Patricia Zell, staff attorney of the committee at 224-2251.

AUTHORITY FOR COMMITTEES TO MEET

COMMITTEE ON RULES AND ADMINISTRATION

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Rules and Administration may have permission to meet today notwithstanding the fact that the Senate is in session. This request has been cleared on both sides of the aisle.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

S. 975, THE SECURITIES SAFETY AND SOUNDNESS ACT OF 1985

● Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, it is a pleasure to join with my distinguished colleague from New Mexico in sponsoring S. 975, the Securities Safety and Soundness Act of 1985. I believe this measure is a necessary step to insure the safety and soundness of our capital markets and banking system. It is not a permanent answer to some of the financing questions that have been raised by the most recent wave of mergers and acquisitions but it does address perhaps the most novel and least understood of these financing techniques.

This measure addresses the issue of junk bonds. These are the high yield, high risk securities we have been hearing so much about lately. Junk bonds are those considered below investment grade by the major bond rating services of Moody's and Standard and Poor's. Because they are not considered to be of investment quality, they carry higher risk and therefore, higher return. I suppose that ones position regarding the use of junk bonds is related to ones views regarding the merger and acquisition phenomena. I happen to believe that merger mania is not in the overall best interest of our country. I am concerned that mergers and acquisitions, especially of a forced nature, divert credit from more useful productive purposes, and result in trauma to many of the vanquished company's stakeholders. The unfortunate results of some mergers have been plant closings, job loses, community disruptions and other unpleasant side effects. In addition, the management of a target company is often forced to divert attention from the normal operations and sacrifice the long-term good of the company for short-term financial considerations. The result is often a tremendous new debt load, swapped for equity, that compromises the long range viability of the firm.

I believe this bill represents a reasoned approach to the issue of junk bond financing of hostile takeover efforts. It does not ban forever the use of junk bonds for this purpose. It only places a moratorium for the remainder of this year where 20 percent of the acquisition is financed by these bonds. This makes sense because we simply do not know very much about junk bonds. We really do not have any track record to go by, especially of their performance during difficult economic periods. To me, this suggests considerable caution. The short period of the moratorium would give us some additional time to look at the junk bond phenomena and evaluate their impact not only on the merger and acquisition question but also the capital markets in general and corporate competitive positions.

The other important feature of the bill would prevent federally insured financial institutions from purchasing these securities for their portfolios. Here again the safety and soundness questions are paramount. We have just experienced a very difficult situation for some institutions in Ohio and given the absolute necessity to maintain confidence in our banking system, prudence and caution should be our main consideration. This bill will assist in this effort.●

NINETIETH ANNIVERSARY OF THE COMBINED JEWISH PHILANTHROPIES OF GREATER BOSTON

● Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, I wish to recognize and honor the Combined Jewish Philanthropies of Greater Boston as they celebrate 90 years of service to the community on April 25, 1985.

The Combined Jewish Philanthropies of Greater Boston stands for a cohesive Jewish community, unified by its concern for the quality of Jewish life at home, in Israel, and around the world.

As first charitable federation in the United States and the acknowledged model for subsequent charities using the "umbrella" concept, this organization is truly a pioneer in providing human welfare and social services to the community.

Today, this organization proudly continues a tradition of service to the Jewish community, assisting in the work of 75 local, national, and overseas agencies.

Annually, volunteers of all ages and backgrounds share their skills and resources, giving untold hours to supporting vital programs and services, fundraising, and planning for the needs of the community.

In the Greater Boston area, the Combined Jewish Philanthropies supports Beth Israel Hospital, the Jewish Memorial Hospital, and the Recuperative Center, all three of which are major health care facilities.

Counseling and support services are provided by the Jewish Family and Children's Service, the Jewish Vocational Service, and the Jewish Big Brother and Sister Association. Many cultural, educational, and recreational activities are enjoyed by thousands each year at branches of three Jewish Community Center.

The Bureau of Jewish Education develops programs, courses, resource materials, and innovative teaching techniques to enrich learning experiences for day and afternoon Hebrew students.

The Combined Jewish Philanthropies of Greater Boston is a significant force in Jewish life. Over 50 percent of the funds raised annually are channeled abroad through the United Jewish Appeal, and are used for resettlement and absorption of immigrants in Israel and aid dwindling and isolated Jewish communities in Eastern Europe, North Africa, and South America. It is men and women in every walk of life affirming their commitment to the institutions of our Jewish community, and linked by their caring for Jewish people around the world.

I wish to offer my congratulations to the Combined Jewish Philanthropies for their numerous achievements and contributions to the community, and hope that you will join me in celebrating their 90th anniversary of service.●

THE PUCCIO REPORT ON THE WESTWAY HIGHWAY PROJECT

● Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, several weeks ago I was pleased to join Senators PROXMIRE, BRADLEY and LAUTENBERG in the introduction of S. 826, the Westway Landfill Funding Prohibition and Hudson River Habitat Protection Act of 1985. Our bill would prohibit the use of Highway Trust Fund money for the Westway Landfill.

What's the big deal about Westway, anyway? In short, the project could end up being one of the greatest wonders in the less than wonderful world of boondoggles. In order to build a 4-mile interstate highway along the west side of Manhattan, the Westway plan calls for creating more than 220 acres of prime real estate in New York by filling in the Hudson River. Under the plan, 169 acres would be available for development. Estimates for the costs of this incredible project range from $4 billion to $6 billion—a substantial portion of which would come from the Nation's highway trust fund.

There's more—according to the National Marine Fisheries Service, the Westway project could "threaten the survival of the Hudson River population of the striped bass." The striped bass is an important commercial and recreation species which has been in serious decline along the Eastern Seaboard. Stripers have used the existing piers on the west side of Manhattan as nursery grounds. The Westway Landfill threatens to wipe out these grounds and thus put increased stress on up to 50 percent of the striper population along the Eastern Seaboard.

What makes Westway the wrong way is the fact that the State and the city do have alternatives to the project. Specifically, the Federal Highway Administration says that a nonlandfill road could be constructed along the west side for under $1 billion. Or, $1.71 billion in Federal funds which would be used to construct Westway could be traded to construct a nonlandfill highway and to rehabilitate New York's mass transit system.

In 1983, Governor Cuomo of New York commissioned Attorney Thomas Puccio to study the Westway project versus the alternatives. I think the study provides an excellent analysis of the issues involved in the Westway controversy, and I commend it to my colleagues. Today, I am inserting the first half of the report, and on Friday I will insert the second half.

Mr. President, I ask that the first half of the Puccio report on Westway be printed in the RECORD.

The material follows:

THE PUCCIO REPORT ON WESTWAY

Last July, I agreed to report on the continued viability of the controversial Westway project, in light of a federal District Court Judge's finding that State officials had suppressed important evidence during the approval process. This task proved too burdensome to complete on the sixty-day-period of time originally contemplated. Since taking the assignment, I have devoted considerable time to a review of documents (including briefs, court decisions, correspondence, and newspaper articles concerning Westway), and I have spoken at length with a number of individuals who are in favor of, and opposed to, the project.

Based on the above, I have reached two basic conclusions:

1. Whatever merit the Westway project originally had, it has now become a luxury that the City and State probably cannot afford. Moreover, legal entanglements which continue unresolved to date have put Westway almost out of reach. Accordingly, the valuable trade-in opportunity should be seriously explored before it is too late.

2. The federal District Court findings of deception by state officials makes an investigation by an appropriate state or federal agency a necessary step to restore public confidence in the integrity of the approval process.

BACKGROUND

Westway is a proposed highway/land development project that has been designed to take advantage of Federal funding available under the interstate highway laws. To the extent that Westway expenditures fall within the "interstate highway" definition and subject to the ultimate availability of funds. Westway's costs would be 90% covered by the Federal government, 10% by the State. At present, the State's cost estimate is in the order of $2 billion, though opponents believe that the eventual price would be $4 billion or more.

Westway is styled as a replacement roadway for the old West Side Highway south of 42nd Street. It would not, however, be built in the existing right-of-way (which is adequate to support a modest replacement roadway). Instead, approximately 200 acres of the Hudson River would be landfilled, and the road would be tunneled through this fill (or, for approximately one-third of its length, routed through an open cut in the fill or mounted on an elevated structure above the fill). The area of the fill ranges from the current bulkhead line outward as far as 800 feet to the pierhead line and is generally referred to as the "interpier area." According to the 1977 Environmental Impact Statement (EIS) for Westway, approximately 90 acres of the landfill would be used for parkland, 100 acres would be available for development, and the remaining area would support the highway and its interchanges.

The history of how Westway was developed as a concept and manipulated through the review process is lengthy and need not be repeated here. It is sufficient to note that funding approval was given by the Federal Highway Administration (FHWA) in January 1977: an air quality permit was issued for the project in 1980; and a Corps of Engineers' dredge and fill permit has since been set aside by the U.S. District Court (recently affirmed by the U.S. Court of Appeals), and the matter has been remanded to those agencies for reconsideration after the preparation of a new EIS. The preparation of that EIS is now underway.

THE PRINCIPAL ISSUES

At the center of the Westway debate are two principal issues: first, the allocation of available Federal money to a combined highway real estate project or the alternative use of such funds for transit rehabilitation and other infrastructure improvements, and second, the impact of the highway and potential landfill development on existing communities, especially Greenwich Village. In addition, the District Court trial identified a third issue of substantial importance—i.e., the damage that the landfill might do to important fisheries resources of the Hudson River.

ALLOCATION OF FEDERAL FUNDS

The debate over the allocation of available Federal monies derives from Section 103(e)(4) of the Federal-Aid Highway Act, which authorizes the State and City (if they agree) to abandon Westway and use the funds instead for substitute transit and roadway projects. Most Westway opponents are strongly in favor of this "trade-in" alternative, because of the immense infrastructure capital needs that the State and City face. Westway proponents, in contrast, have asserted that the trade-in is illusory and that in any event, Westway represents a "once-in-a-life-time opportunity" which should not be missed.

LAND USE

The "land use" issue has its own history. When Westway was first conceived, the Lower West Side was generally run down as it edged toward the Hudson. As a consequence, Westway was seen as the key to revitalizing this area. Since 1977, however, much of the Lower West Side has renewed itself through new construction and accelerated conversions. Thus, today, the residential communities in the Village and Tribeca, as well as in Lower Manhattan, already extend to West Street, and Westway has become something of an anachronism in this regard. Instead, for many community residents, Westway has become a spectre, since the landfill development could serve to cut them off from the Hudson. In addition, if the development should end up being luxury housing, the pressures on rentals (as well as co-op and condominium prices) in the existing upland neighborhoods could be severe.

IMPACT ON FISHERIES

Finally, the potential fisheries impacts have become a matter of concern to the groups who have been concerned with protecting the Hudson over the past 20 years. In this construction, the species of fish the most severely affected appears to be the striped bass, which has great commercial and sports value not only in the Hudson, but also on the north and south shores of Long Island, all the way to Montauk. The striped bass has been at the center of power plant controversies on the Hudson for many years and was probably the key factor in defeating Con Edison's proposal to build a pumped storage plant at Storm King Mountain. For the groups involved in that and other Hudson River controversies (including sports and commercial fishing interests), the idea that Westway could (to quote the National Marine Fisheries Service) "threaten the survival of the Hudson River population of striped bass" is a matter of deep concern.

THE CURRENT STATUS OF WESTWAY AND THE LIGIGATION

When the U.S. District Court set aside the Corps and FHWA approvals of Westway, Judge Griesa directed the preparation of a revised EIS on the fisheries impacts and reconsideration by both the Corps and FHWA, based on that revised EIS. Pending such reconsideration, the Court enjoined all major construction connected with Westway and most other substantial expenditures. As a result of that decision and injunction (which was affirmed by the U.S. Court of Appeals on February 25, 1983), major work on Westway has been brought to a halt.

In issuing its decision and injunction, the District Court found that the New York State Department of Transportation (NYSDOT), as well as FHWA, had acted in bad faith and conspired to conceal critical new information on potential fisheries impacts. As a consequence of these findings (which were also affirmed by the Court of Appeals), the District Court made specific in its injunction the further steps that the Corps was bound to follow on the remand. Central among these was the obligation that the Corps act independently of, and not defer to, NYSDOT in shaping its decision. In addition, the Corps was explicitly instructed to consult with, and give great weight to the views of, the expert Federal fisheries agencies in deciding what additional field studies, if any, were to be undertaken.

CORPS' RECENT BEHAVIOR

Following the Court decision, the Corps began to gear up to prepare a revised EIS, and in that connection initiated a systematic inquiry into the need for additional studies. This led in August 1982 to a recommendation by the Corps' own consultants that further field studies be undertaken. Subsequently, in October, an expert panel assembled by the Corps concluded that two winters of additional work were needed and that the studies must be carried out independent of NYSDOT and its consultants. These judgements were, in turn, endorsed by each of the Federal fisheries agencies. However, when the State objected to doing such studies, the Corps abandoned the position which its expert consultants had taken and simply accepted what the State offered (which was a single winter of local sampling). Furthermore, despite the specific terms of the injunction that the Corps conduct its own independent evaluation, and despite the explicit recommendations of the expert panel that any studies be carried out independent of NYSDOT consultants, the Corps is apparently using NYSDOT—and the same NYSDOT consultants whom the District Court found to have misrepresented the earlier fisheries results—to carry out the future field work. Beyond this, the studies now being undertaken were commissioned without consultation with the Federal fisheries agencies.

In view of the preceding conduct (which is virtually a repetition of the 1980-81 activities that the District Court found unacceptable), the plaintiffs have moved to hold the Corps and NYSDOT in contempt. Judge Griesa, for his part, has made his concern quite clear and has scheduled court proceedings which are now ongoing. If the Corps and/or the State are held in contempt, the EIS process will have to start over and two winters of additional field work will eventually have to be undertaken.

TIMETABLE

This, of course, is not in accord with the State's timetable. To the contrary. Shortly before the contempt motion was filed, the State was reported as expecting a revised draft EIS to be available by April. This has not happened; but even if a draft was forthcoming soon, in light of the conduct described above, it would very likely be found defective by Judge Griesa. Accordingly, it is unlikely that an adequate EIS will be issued in 1983. If this happens, and taking account of time required for further judicial review, it is unlikely that major Westway work could resume before 1985, even if the outcome of the review process were favorable to the project.

"NO POSSIBLE ALTERNATIVES?"

In the last connection, one other point should be recognized: there may well be an insuperable substantive obstacle to Westway: Specifically, under the Clean Water Act, the foiling of "special aquatic habitat" can only be permitted under extraordinary circumstances, where there are no possible alternatives. If, as the 1979-80 fisheries data appear to show, the interpier area is an important winter nursery for young striped bass and other fish, it will qualify as a "special aquatic habitat;" and since there are clearly alternatives to Westway (even if some people deem them less desirable), then under the applicable law, the Corps will not be able to issue a landfill permit. The likelihood of this outcome is all the greater because the Federal fisheries agencies continue to oppose the landfill permit; and as recently emphasized by the Court of Appeals in affirming Judge Griesa, the Corps must give "great weight" to these views. The Corps will not meet that test if, as in the last time around, if simply ignores the negative recommendations of the agencies.

In summary, the legal proceedings surrounding Westway are likely to stretch out many months, if not many years; and while it would be foolish to contend that a permit could never be issued, the obstacles are substantial and any authorization to proceed is uncertain at best.

THE TRADE-IN ALTERNATIVE

The alternative to Westway deserving the most serious consideration is the "trade-in" of Westway, and the use of Westway funds for a substitute replacement road, combined with transit and other infrastructure improvements.

The trade-in requires as a first step that the Governor and the Mayor join together to request that Westway be withdrawn as an interstate route and that the funds required to complete it (as set out in the most recent interstate cost estimate) be made available instead for substitute transit and roadway projects. The request is made to the Secretary of the U.S. Department of Transportation. To date, every such request made to the Secretary (now totalling nearly 30) has been approved, and there is no reason to believe that the result would be different with Westway. To the contrary, every recent Secretary of Transportation has indicated that if a Westway trade-in request were made, it would be approved.

Once the trade-in was effected, an "account" to the benefit of the City and State would be established in Washington, against which substitute transit and roadway projects would be authorized. The value of that account, based on current cost estimates, would be approximately $1.5 billion. (These funds require a 15% local match whether used for transit or roads.)

An initial allocation from the trade-in funds would be required to complete and improve the substitute roadway link between 42nd Street and the Battery. The State has already removed most of the old overhead structures, and an interim road has been developed which provides a reasonable, if sometimes congested, vehicle route down the West Side. Significant improvements, however, may be possible with trade-in funds. For example, according to one view, within the 260-foot right-of-way that exists today, the roadway could be relocated eastward to permit the construction of a border park; a pedestrian overpass could be provided to facilitate access to the waterfront; turning lanes could be added to smooth the flow of traffic; intersections could be reduced in number to alleviate congestion; and, in general, a first-rate surface arterial could be developed to carry both auto and truck traffic along the West Side corridor. While the resulting roadway would not have the capacity of Westway, the speed differential would be small, involving, at most, five to ten minutes of additional driving time in a rush hour setting.

FUNDS FOR OTHER BOROUGHS

To reconstruct such a replacement road, including associated rehabilitation of the waterfront, the allocation of $100 million of the trade-in funds would undoubtedly be more than sufficient. The remaining trade-in funds, totalling approximately $1.4 million (plus the State share of approximately $200 million), would then be available for transit rehabilitation and bridge, road and related infrastructure repairs and improvements. These funds could be used, moreover, not only in Manhattan, but also to the benefit of the outlaying boroughs and, the general metropolitan area. For example, subway improvements could be financed in the Bronx, Brooklyn and Queens, as well as in Manhattan; funds might be used to purchase new buses for Staten Island; interborough bridges could be rehabilitated; and roadways could be repaired in diverse sections of the metropolitan area. In short, while the bulk of the funds would presumably be spent in Manhattan, trade-in offers options that could provide much broader benefits.[1]

The trade-in funds would be a major and critical source of the money needed to buoy up failing capital infrastructure. Even with the MTA's expanded 10-year program, for example, there are substantial shortfalls of transit capital funds; and the problem is equally serious in connection with bridges and roads. Furthermore, the allocation of trade-in funds to transit rehabilitation would avoid the need for up to $1 billion of borrowed capital and the resultant interest charges. This could save 10 cents to 20 cents in terms of the fare.

SURER FUNDING FOR TRADE-IN

Recent changes in the Federal Highway laws have increased the attractiveness of trade-in, in certain respects. In particular trade-ins for substitute roadway projects (including bridges) will now be funded out of the Highway Trust Fund, rather than being dependent on annual appropriations from the General Fund. This should provide somewhat greater assurance of receiving such funds in a timely way (at least as great assurance as for Westway itself) and will also relieve to some degree the annual competition for transit trade-in funds. The latter have been tentatively set at between $365 million and $400 million annually for the next four years—a relatively low sum which could, however, be increased. In any event it has been estimated that if Westway were traded-in, New York could obtain at least $100 million a year for transit, based on the current authorization level. That would be a substantial amount in its own right.

The preceding discussion assumes that the trade-in funds would be drawn down within the context of the current law. However, this need not be the case. If a decision were made to trade-in, it is possible (if not probable) that a deal could be negotiated with the Federal government that would be more advantageous than the scenario described above. For example, a regularized flow of Federal funds (perhaps $200 million a year over 10 years) might be effectively guaranteed, allowing the State to issue its own bonds, backed entirely by the flow of Federal funds. This would allow major repair work to proceed immediately and in an expansive way—all at the time when it is needed most. Such a program could also generate large numbers of current jobs, equal to or even greater than could Westway.

Based on experience in Boston, Chicago and Washington itself, it is apparent that the State of New York can make a deal with the Federal government to assure that trade-in works. Up to now neither the State nor the City has been prepared to negotiate; and so long as they remain unwilling to do so, they will be inclined to assert that trade-in does not work. However, it does, as the elections by other cities and states have shown; and in my view, there is little doubt that it will work in the case of Westway; if the City and State make that election and follow it through.●

[1] It is also worth noting that the trade-in would benefit the poor to a far greater extent than Westway, since the less affluent are heavily dependent on the subway and bus system.

NINTH ANNUAL SWEET POTATO AFFAIR

● Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the golden sunshine of spring calls to mind that most nutritious of foods—the delicious golden yam. Today, April 25, we are observing the ninth annual "Sweet Potato Affair," to celebrate the flavor and nutritional value of this excellent vegetable.

Our Nation is enjoying an upsurge of attention to our health and physical condition. We've learned that the kinds and amounts of food we eat can have a definite effect on our well-being.

In fact, the National Academy of Sciences recently came up with a number of suggestions on how our diet can affect our susceptibility of several diseases, including cancer. One of the recommendations was that we eat more fruits and vegetables rich in vitamins A and C.

These new facts make our annual "Yam Day," with its goal of encouraging greater consumption of the Nation's sweet potatoes, even more worthwhile. One sweet potato proudly claims 9,230 units of vitamin A, a greater portion than almost any other comparable food.

The yam is a natural way to satisfy our sweet tooth without adding sugar, and without gaining weight. A medium-sized sweet potato adds only 82 calories to a meal.

Bake them, mash them or—for an occasional treat—serve them candied. Sweet potatoes are especially good with poultry and pork, and don't forget that southern favorite, sweet potato pie.

Because we have such a plentiful yam harvest, the Government uses large amounts of sweet potatoes in its food programs for the military and for schoolchildren. Since major concern of these programs is to provide foods with a high nutritional value and a tasty flavor, the Louisiana yam is custom made. Yams have three great characteristics that make them ideal for Government feeding programs: They are extremely nutritious, they are very very versatile and can be prepared in many different ways, and they have a natural sweet taste that people—especially children—enjoy.

I encourage the U.S. Department of Agriculture and the Department of Defense to continue and increase their purchases of sweet potatoes, and hope that purchasing decisions will be made as early as possible to assist production planning.●

ORTEGA SHOWS HIS COLORS: PLANS VISIT TO MOSCOW

● Mr. QUAYLE. Mr. President, although the Senate has completed its debate over funding of the Contras for the moment, the debate over the character of the Sandinista government in Nicaragua and what U.S. policy should be, will continue.

Ironically, the question of how closely the Sandinistas are working with the Soviet Union was clarified in today's New York Times, 1 day after congressional consideration of funding for the Contras. In an article, "Sandinista Leader Says He Plans to Visit Moscow Soon to Seek Aid," the Times indicates just how little good congressional rejection of military funding of the Contras has done for easing Nicaragua's tilt toward Moscow.

Mr. President, it is essential that Congress understand just how closely the fate of the Sandinistas is tied to continued Soviet military and economic aid. I ask that the full text of the New York Times article be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

[From the New York Times, Apr. 25, 1985]

SANDINISTA LEADER SAYS HE PLANS TO VISIT MOSCOW SOON TO SEEK AID

(By Stephen Kinzer)

MANAGUA, NICARAGUA, April 23.—President Daniel Ortega Saavedra said today that he would visit Moscow at the end of this month to discuss economic assistance.

"We are visiting the Soviet Union to make proposals, naturally in the area of economics," he said, "to try to recover a little of what the United States has denied us."

Mr. Ortega also said he was pleased with the Congressional rejection of President Reagan's proposal for continued aid to insurgents fighting the Sandinista Government, but he insisted that the United States further ease pressure on his Government.

A leader of the domestic political opposition, Luis Rivas Leiva of the Social Democratic Party, said that with the Administration request defeated, "the Sandinistas should live up to the commitments they made to the Congressmen who came to our country." Several members of Congress who met President Ortega this month reported that he had indicated he would respond to an aid cutoff with a favorable gesture to the domestic opposition.

VISIT TO ARCHBISHOP

In what was viewed as a conciliatory gesture, President Ortega today called on Archbishop Miguel Obando y Bravo and congratulated him on being elevated to the rank of Cardinal. The Archbishop, whose elevation was annnounced in Rome today, has been a harsh critic of the Sandinistas.

Mr. Ortega said the Congressional votes on Tuesday represented "a favorable gesture the could help the search for a peaceful solution," but he noted that many members of Congress had voted in favor of the Administration's proposals, and he said Congress could only affect part of American foreign policy.

SENATOR OBJECTS TO TRIP

(By Shirley Christian)

WASHINGTON, April 24.—A United States senator who voted against President Reagan's request for aid to the rebels said today that he would have voted in favor had he known of Mr. Ortega's planned trip.

Senator Jim Sasser, a Tennessee Democrat, said it was "an ill-timed and ill-advised trip which I think only serves to underscore the growing East-West conflict in Central America." He added: "I think for him to be going to the Soviet Union at this time, just when the Administration is beginning to show some flexibility as the result of pressures from Congress, indicates that the Sandinista leader is either naive, incompetent or not as committed to negotiations as recent statements would indicate."

In another development, three Nicaraguan opposition leaders issued a news release today in which they urged the Congress to channel any aid through the United States Agency for International Development, not through the Red Cross or the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees.

They said aid through the private organizations would "in effect be used to neutralize and disperse the movement of the Democratic Resistance in Nicaragua" while aid through the government agency would "signal to the world that the U.S. Congress believes our cause has justice."

The statement carried the names of Arturo Cruz, a leading civilian opposition leader; Adolfo Calero, leader of the Nicaragauan Democratic Force, a rebel group, and Alfonso Robelo Callejas, a leader of the other principal rebel group, the Democratic Revolutionary Alliance.

President Ortega and other leaders of the governing Sandinista Front have made numerous trips to the Soviet Union since coming to power in July 1979. The trips first resulted in agreements on trade and economic cooperation, then the establishment of relations between the Soviet Communist Party and the Sandinista Front, then military assistance.●

THE ABORTED CHILD

● Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, we all know that a child is sentient at the moment of its birth. It is clear from this that the child's sensitivity to light, temperature, sound and pain were developed while the child was still residing within the womb. It is simply logical that otherwise the capacity would not be present at birth. We also know that a fetal surgeon must anesthetize his tiny patient in order to perform surgery. Despite such obvious acknowledgments of fetal pain, we still hear the matter disputed.

We read in "The Development of the Brain, Biological and Functional Perspectives," by Reinis and Goldman, that

The sensory nerves approach the skin of the fetus in the 8th week [gestation] and are in contact with it by the following week * * *. The sensitivity to pressure or contact develops in a cephalocaudal direction from the lips downward. Thus, lip tactile reflex responses may be evoked by the end of the 7th week. By 10.5 weeks, the palms of the hands are responsive to light stroking with a hair, and at 11 weeks, the face and all parts of the upper and lower extremities are sensitive to touch. By 13.5 to 14 weeks, the entire body surface, except for the back and top of the head, is sensitive to pain.

Although we have regulations for the humane disposition of animals, we do nothing for the child in the womb. In abortion, these developing infants are subjected to dismemberment, saline burning, and other cruel procedures. Late-term abortions often produce the "dreaded complication"—a living aborted child. What if, right now, every legislator in America was handed a gasping, living aborted child at his desk? To answer this, let me simply quote from Paul R. Gastonguay's article "Abortion and Law":

Abortion does not merely deal with a mother; it must also deal with the ridding of the aborted child, the occasional piecemeal removal of fetal arms and legs, the drowning of a kicking fetus in a pail of water. If such thoughts are repulsive, as I certainly hope they would be, then surely the whole concept of abortion must be. This is what we are talking about: a bloody, gasping, kicking fetus which any legislator in his right mind would immediately attempt to wash and console.

Mr. President, I ask that two articles, "Unborn Clearly Feel Pain," by Dr. Steven R. Zielinski, and "Pro-Choice Movement Aided by Ignorance," by columnist James Edwards, be printed at this point in the RECORD.

The material follows:

[From the National Right to Life News, Feb. 28, 1985]

UNBORN CLEARLY FEEL PAIN

(By Steve Zielinski, M.D.)

Recent efforts of the pro-abortion lobby to deny the horror of the abortion procedure are not unlike those old magic tricks once popularized by Houdini. Everyone remembers the fascination they spawned. A person was put inside a cabinet and long sharp knives were put in on all sides, and, when the knives were removed, voila!, the person was no longer there!

The response of such pro-abortion stalwarts as Judy Goldsmith to Bernard Nathanson's firm, "The Silent Scream," shows just how dangerous and devious those "old tricks" can be.

The magician's art is to distract your attention from what is occurring before your very eyes. Goldsmith does the same. She claims the film is a sham; too emotional and inaccurate. She is wrong on both counts.

How is one to avoid emotion when a human "lifeform" (dare we say a "human being?") is being torn limb from limb? Of course the abortion evokes emotions. A human being is being torn apart.

In "The Silent Scream," we have within our grasp the means to convert hundreds of thousands, if not millions, of individuals who have been riding the fence on the abortion issue. With their claims of "inaccuracy," the abortion promoters are even now, through the media, trying to create a dust storm to cloud the vision of the viewing public. We must be able to clear away that dust with a few simple answers to the obvious questions and objections.

Do unborn children really scream? Doubtful. Even if they did you couldn't hear any sound travel through the fluid environment of the womb. Do they look like they are screaming during the abortion? The answer is open to interpretation. I'd say yes, but then I think unborn children are people. Those who think unborn children are clumps of tissue can rationalize and say "clumps of tissue don't scream." However, the critical question is, are the previous two questions relevant at all? The answer is a resounding, No!

If one were to decide to beat a dog, would the dog have to cry out and whine before there could be any assurance that the dog's agonizing writhing and efforts to avoid and escape punishment were evidence enough for the pain and distress being suffered?

The womb cloaks unborn children in silence. Since they cannot talk to us and cannot scream or cry, how can we tell whether they experience pain? We must compare their physical activity and capacity with that of those we know can feel pain. Specialists in the nervous system tell us there is a basic difference between an "aversive," or whole body response to something that would normally be painful (a "noxious stimulus"), and a mere "reflex" of the affected body part, like a hand that instinctively pulls away from a hot stove.

A reflex response only goes to the spinal cord and back to the affected limb. Full body aversive responses only come about as a result of activities of the central nervous system—the brain—usually at the level of something called the thalamus.

In noncommunicative human subjects, as well as in dogs and other animals, the "aversive response to a noxious stimulus" is the accepted standard by which the presence of pain is determined.

Kathyrn Moseley, a prominent pediatrician and neonatologist from St. Louis, states in an affidavit in the case of Keith v. Daley that "Infants born between 18 and 24 weeks gestation who have come under my care demonstrate aversive responses to noxious stimuli similar to those seen in infants of later gestational ages. Such responses, and similar responses indicative of discomfort in the newborn subjected to noxious stimuli are interpreted by the neonatologist as pain and treated accordingly."

It is certainly not unreasonable to assume such activities occur in the womb prior to birth among unborn children of the same gestational age. But "The Silent Scream" gives us evidence this occurs even earlier into pregnancy. The pathetic attempts of the 12 week unborn child to escape a suction abortion graphically demonstrate the full body's attempt to avoid destruction, and thus the presence of fetal pain.

Critics of this sort of analysis claim the fetus does not feel pain the way others do, largely because unborn children possess no memory by which to compare the pain and no sense of past or future. They also point out that unborn children lack "significant cortical development." The cortex is the largest portion of the brain, the portion that sits on top of all the other structures, and is responsible for logical thinking and interpretation of sensory information.

The first of these arguments is absurd. It may be true that the unborn child has nothing to compare to the pain of abortion, if she or he has—as some claim—no memory. But if one cannot experience pain without first relating it to a memory of prior pain, how could one ever have experienced the prior pain? The first time a child puts her hand on a hot stove, the pain is real (the burn certainly is real enough) and the lack of memory of a similar pain does not keep the child from crying.

What of the second argument: does the cortex play an important part in the perception of pain? Does the absence of a fully functioning cortex in the unborn child mean pain is not possible?

The medical literature indicates that while the cortex may modulate the response to pain, it is by no means essential in order to experience it. Many textbooks of neurology and physiology point out that there is little evidence that pain information even reaches the sensory cortex in normal adults. The critical structure for the sensation and response to painful stimuli is the thalamus, a small center of nerve interconnections at the base of the brain.

It is not necessary to read advanced medical textbooks to learn this information, you just have to read Time magazine. (An article on "The Mechanism of Pain" was the lead story in a June 1984 issue of Time.) We know that the unborn has a functioning thalamus by 9 weeks gestation.

However, the importance of the cortex should not be ignored; it is essential for sapient adults to use the logical thinking functions of the cortex to realize the basic injustice of abortion.

The third objection Goldsmith and her cohorts make to the claim of fetal pain just doesn't make sense. Again and again, they dismiss fetal movements in response to painful stimuli as mere "reflexes." But those who use their cortex know that the limb does not control the body and that sensation of noxious stimuli in one limb should not cause the other limbs to try to get away from the stimulus as we see in The Silent Scream.

That horrible little drama we see during an ultrasound abortion is not a single isolated event. While we may see it only once, the human tragedy is replayed again and again, thousands of times a day. Normal human beings who see the film cannot help but identify with that helpless solitary voyager—soon to be terrorized and tortured.

When the "old tricks" of the abortion promoters are finally put back in the magician's chest, and viewers can respond—in their minds and in their hearts—to what abortion really is, then there will truly be a public scream—a scream of outrage and horror. But, as legislators and judges will come to know, that scream will not be silent.

PRO-CHOICE MOVEMENT AIDED BY IGNORANCE

(By James Edwards)

Prodded by an indignant pro-choice faction, the authorities in Pensacola, Fla., spent much of last week scurrying around trying to find out whether any laws were broken by a pro-life activist who displayed an aborted 20-week-old fetus during a television interview.

They should have asked me—I could have saved them the effort.

There are no laws existing in any of these United States regarding the disposition or disposal of fetuses.

Most fetuses—and there is an abundant supply of them—are incinerated. Smaller ones are frequently flushed into the sewer system. Others are stored in jars of formaldehyde, rather like surplus garden produce pickled for use in the off-season. Pickled fetuses are sold for use in medical research or commerce.

Some clinics and hospitals put fetuses out with the trash. Last May, United Press International reported on a Mother's Day ceremony in Dallas involving the mass burial of 1,000 fetuses recovered from a dumpster in an alley behind an abortion clinic.

Also in 1984, stray dogs sniffing around a dump in Kansas City, Mo., began tearing open garbage sacks full of fetuses. The same thing happened in Richmond, Va., where plastic bags containing fetuses were pulled by dogs from a trash compactor. After the animals had eaten their fill, the site was littered with the bones of babies. Photographs of the grisly scene were widely disseminated by pro-life forces, much to the distress and indignation of the pro-choice movement.

It's not that the pro-choice crowd really cares what happens to the fetuses after they have been killed. If, as they claim, fetuses are inhuman, then it matters little how they are disposed of after death. Right?

No, the reason they get so uptight when confronted by images of dead fetuses is that they don't want the general public to get a glimpse of their handiwork.

Take this Pensacola case. As soon as John Burt, a local pro-life activist, began unwrapping a fetus on camera, the newscaster who was conducting the live interview signalled frantically for the scene to be taken off camera.

Why the panic? In pursuit of an answer, I called station WEAR and asked to speak to Becky Ozburn, the newscaster who had pulled the plug on John Burt. Ms. Osburn was unavailable for comment, but Renee Lewis, another anchorwoman, explained that Burt's action had threatened to turn the interview into "a circus." She added something to the effect that many viewers were eating their dinner at the time and that she assumed their appetites had been spoiled by the sight of the "grey-colored" fetus.

It seems she was right. Both WEAR and the Escambia County Sheriff's Department received some "pretty indignant" phone calls from viewers who had gotten a disturbing glimpse of the fetus.

Interestingly enough, not all the callers were pro-choice. Some said they had open minds on the abortion issue, others said they sympathized with the pro-life viewpoint; virtually all of them, however, denounced Burt's action.

"They thought it was—well—inappropriate," a sheriffs department spokesman told me, adding that several callers wondered if Burt had left himself open to prosecution.

The question is significant because it shows how confused many people are about abortion. For example, the tiny body which was shown briefly on WEAR was so demonstrably human that it prompted a flood of phone calls from irate viewers demanding that legal action be taken against the person who was walking around with a corpse in his possession. Paradoxically, however, some of those outraged callers identified themselves as being pro-choice supporters, which meant that—at least theoretically—they subscribed to the argument that abortion does not involve the taking of human life.

This confusion and ignorance on the part of the general public is clearly in the best interests of the pro-choice movement, which is locked in a kind of public relations battle with the pro-lifers for the hearts and minds of the American people.

The pro-choice set would have Americans believe that abortion involves nothing more than flushing formless blobs of fetal matter out of the womb. In many instances it does. But in too many cases it involves the aborting of second and third-trimester fetuses—such as the one which so upset the WEAR viewers. That such "viable" fetuses experience pain when being aborted is no longer open to debate. According to numerous medical experts—including two past presidents of the American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists—it is patently absurd to suggest that fetuses with fully developed nervous systems are immune to pain.

The unmistakable humanity of such late-stage fetuses is the reason why the pro-choice faction gets so jittery when somebody like John Burt attempts to jolt society into an awareness of what abortion actually involves. Thus far, the pro-choice movement—aided by powerful allies in the media—has been able to keep the public largely in the dark about abortion. People like John Burt are dying to bring some light to bear on the subject. If, in so doing, they are accused of resorting to bizarre and even tasteless tactics, then that is the price they are willing to pay in defense of the living but unborn.●

DEFENSE CONTRACT ABUSES

● Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, for several years now, there has been a repetitious disclosing of malpractice, bad practice and just plain dumb practice by corporations selling military equipment to our government. I, first, have to commend the Members of this body, like Senator GRASSLEY and Senator ROTH, who have been pursuing these mistakes and, as I have pointed out, as long as they stick to that approach, I am all with them and wish them luck.

Now, what has been happening? Two stories, appearing in this morning's edition of USA Today, show real progress. One article by John Fisher, who is president of the American Security Council, points out the great advances being made by the Navy, and I can report, as chairman of the Armed Services Committee, that every other service has the same type of operation going now, although they are not as fully or as completely developed as the Navy's.

The other article, by Joseph Sherick, who is inspector general for the Defense Department, points out the great number of people that he has employed under his command to get at the bottom of these abuses whenever they are disclosed or even when they are not disclosed, which is more important.

When I became chairman of the Armed Services Committee, I said that my aim in the Senate would be to get "more bang for the buck," and doing that will mean a lot of work in this field of getting all contractors to toe the line.

I have to say to my colleagues and friends that, while there have been abuses, they have been practiced by a relatively small percentage of the total contractors. Most of them operate in a proper manner, but the few who haven't are being brought to "court" by Secretary Weinberger and by the separate services, themselves.

To indicate the interest of the Armed Services Committee in this, I asked the committee this year to establish a Subcommittee on Defense Acquisition Policy. Chaired by Senator QUAYLE, and with Senator LEVIN as the ranking minority member, the subcommittee has done an outstanding job of investigating procurement policy questions. The Defense authorization bill for fiscal year 1986, which will be reported to the Senate in a few days, includes thoughtful provisions reflecting this excellent work.

In addition, other members of our committee have had a strong interest in these matters. Senator GRAMM is the author of the Defense Efficiency and Economy Act of 1985, which was adopted by the committee. That proposal not only addresses some very important procurement problems, but also takes important steps toward saving the American taxpayer hundreds of millions of dollars by changing long-standing congressionally imposed waste in such areas as contracting out, base closings, and wage scale calculation on defense construction contracts. I hope that the Senate will support all these proposals when our authorization bill comes to the floor.

I ask that the two articles I have referred be printed in the RECORD.

The articles follow:

THE ABUSE IS RARE; PENTAGON'S FINDING IT

(By John M. Fisher)

BOSTON, VA.—Any mismanagement or waste by defense contractors is taken very seriously by all of us who are involved in national security.

We will not excuse any firm that does not implement the numerous reforms initiated by Secretary Caspar Weinberger, but we also feel the public has to recognize that major change is occurring.

Navy Secretary John Lehman has in fact already announced that 40 percent of the new commissions for flag-rank officers in the Navy will be reserved for those who have a background in procurement.

The numerous stories about overpriced spare parts have seriously hampered the president's efforts to rearm the USA. Anti-defense lawmakers have had a field day with their charges that defense contractors are selling $7,600 coffee makers and $436 hammers to the Pentagon.

The public can clearly understand these stories, but they lose sight of the fact that there are 13 million contract actions each year at the Pentagon. In addition, the Defense Department operates on such a large scale that any mistake involves eyebrow-raising sums.

Anti-defense lawmakers and the news media usually do not mention that these "revelations" were first uncovered by the Defense Department and the industry itself. The department has completely overhauled the procurement process, and most of the charges being made against the defense industry must be labeled as cheap shots.

We recognize that there are sincere individuals who are concerned about military reform. But, unfortunately, far too many people are taking information out of context and using it to smear the Defense Department and the defense industry in an attempt to force cuts in the defense budget.

The great majority of these controversial contracts were initiated in previous administrations. And, in fact, the Pentagon never paid for those $436 hammers. It simply told the manufacturer to give the government a refund, or that firm would not be doing business with the Pentagon in the future.

In the current budget debate, we cannot lose sight of the strategic importance of our defense industry. Meaningful reforms have already been implemented in the defense procurement process, and Weinberger has significantly increased the number of contracts that are open to competitive bidding. We are all very concerned about the charges that relate to overpricing, but it must be recognized that these abuses have occurred in only a very small percentage of contracts.

Our national security has suffered from decades of neglect, and it would be tragic if these sensational charges derailed the president's modernization program.

The defense industry has served the USA well, and it deserves to be called the "arsenal of democracy."

NEW WEAPONS TO COMBAT FRAUD

(By Joseph H. Sherick)

WASHINGTON.—In the year ended Sept. 30, the Department of Defense placed 15 million contracts worth $146 billion involving over 60,000 prime contractors and hundreds of thousands of other suppliers and subcontractors.

The department's internal audit organizations issued over 18,000 reports with potential monetary benefits of over $2.7 billion. They issued over 61,000 audit reports with net savings of over $7.4 billion.

There are 750 fraud-trained criminal investigators in the department. We have recommended adding 400 more.

We have conducted 15 five-day fraud training seminars, which have provided advanced training to over 500 Defense criminal investigators.

We have prepared a handbook on contract fraud indicators, which has been distributed to 50,000 procurement, audit, and investigative personnel.

My office has also conducted over 375 fraud training sessions for 18,000 procurement personnel—in addition to 6,400 fraud training sessions provided to 240,000 Defense management officials by criminal investigators assigned to the military departments.

We have developed training materials to be used by trade associations and contractors to assist in identifying for their members and employees the types of procurement fraud that will be investigated and prosecuted by the government.

The department has the right to protect itself from contractors who cannot adequately demonstrate their responsibility as government contractors. In 1984, the department suspended or barred 454 contractors, compared with 79 in 1980.

Generally, I believe the government is in a much more capable position to deal with procurement fraud in the Department of Defense than it was two years ago.

Working with the Department of Justice and the FBI, we have increased investigative and prosecutive resources, improved referral procedures, provided enhanced levels of training, developed more significant investigations, and seen an increase in the number of indictments and convictions.

For example, in fiscal year 1982, the Department of Defense obtained 27 indictments and 102 convictions. In fiscal year 1984, we obtained 174 indictments and 181 convictions.●

ON THE PLIGHT OF SOVIET JEWS AND TRENDS IN SOVIET DISSENT

● Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, during the past several weeks, I have attempted to keep my colleagues aware of the conditions in Soviet-controlled Afghanistan through the insertion of various journalistic pieces in the RECORD. The tragic plight of the Afghan people under Soviet Russian tyranny is a cause to which I am committed. I will continue to press the case for greater public awareness of this tragedy, and I hope that many of my colleagues will join me.

Today, however, I wish to turn my attention, and the attention of this body, to the plight of another group of human beings who suffer under relentless Soviet repression. I am speaking of the campaign of persecution, both official and informal, against Soviet Jews and the community of dissidents in the Soviet Union. Their only crime is that they continue to speak out for such basic causes as self-determination, freedom of religion, and the right of emigration. These, of course, are not the only reasons for which the KGB and other organs of "state security" have seen fit to intimidate, humiliate, and persecute these defenseless segments of the population. But they are such fundamental human rights as to highlight the degree of repression which exists within the Soviet Union.

Indeed, it is all too evident that repression within the Soviet Union has increased drastically over the last several years. It was not too long ago that many in the West were debating whether Yuri Andropov's appreciation of Western jazz would make him a less implacable Soviet dictator; meanwhile, former KGB-Chief Andropov wasted no time in rounding up the dissident community for imprisonment and exile, and reduced the level of emigration of Soviet Jews from a trickle to a virtual halt. Such has been the effect of "Westernization" upon Soviet leaders. We can only guess as to what effect this acculturation has had upon Mr. Andropov's protege and successor, Mikhail Gorbachev, and those with whom he has recently surrounded himself.

Mr. President, I hope that I speak for this entire body when I say that I am appalled and disgusted by this vicious campaign of intolerance and repression. I could go on for hours on end in enunciating the crimes which the Soviet Government has perpetrated upon the harmless community of dissidents and Soviet Jews, particularly the refuseniks, who are at the same time mercilessly persecuted and cruelly refused permission to leave.

In fact, the record of Soviet official conduct speaks for itself. By the record, I mean the facts compiled in the staff report of the U.S. Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe, more commonly known as the Helsinki Commission, to which the Soviet Union itself is a signatory. Their report, "A Summary of 1984 Trends in Soviet Dissent," reports faithfully the miserable record of the Soviet Union on human rights and their brutal treatment of Soviet Jews and dissidents. I would ask that a copy of this report follow the conclusion of my remarks.

Mr. President, it is my understanding that the Helsinki Commission will convene the second week in May this year in Ottawa, at which time the issue of the mistreatment of these oppressed people may be raised. I wish to thank the distinguished majority leader and Senator D'AMATO, the new chairman of the Commission, for inviting me to sit as a delegate to the Helsinki Commission; I appreciate his thoughtful understanding of my interest in the plight of the Afghan people and the oppressed who remain fettered within the Soviet Union. I want to inform my colleagues that, when the Helsinki Commission meets in May, I intend to be a vocal and persistent critic of Soviet official behavior toward the basic human rights of speech, of religion and of emigration which are so shamelessly absent in the Soviet Union.

The report follows:

A SUMMARY OF 1984 TRENDS IN SOVIET DISSENT—CSCE COMMISSION STAFF SURVEY

Soviet human rights performance continued its 5-year decline in 1984. The Soviet government throughout the year sustained its harsh law-and-order campaign KGB-style initiated after the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan in late 1979. During this period, the Soviet government demonstrated almost total disdain for world opinion on human rights issues and virtually ignored its international commitments under the Helsinki accords and UN agreements. Exemplifying this Soviet attitude, the Kremlin ignored Andrei Sakharov's plea—despite a hunger stike in May—to permit his wife, Elena Bonner, to be allowed to go West for medical treatment. Indeed, the Kremlin has almost totally isolated the Sakharovs from family, friends and the world.

What were some major elements of this Kremlin anti-dissent campaign in 1984? The promulgation of four new laws to broaden the so-called crime of dissent and to further isolate the Soviet population from foreign contacts was one factor. Greater violence and more brutal treatment of political prisoners, as seen in the death of seven Prisoners of Conscience (POCs) in 1984, was another. A renewed official drive to eradicate samizdat (unofficial literature) and thus to stifle any expression of independent political, religious, national, cultural or economic views was a third significant element. The continued imposition of nearly insurmountable obstacles to emigration was still another component.

NEW ARRESTS AND TRAILS

In terms of numbers, there were at least 130 arrests of Soviet human rights activists in 1984, including 71 religious activists, 21 would-be emigrants, 12 Jewish activists, 12 Georgian activists and 11 distributors or authors of samizdat. There were at least 41 trials of Soviet dissidents in 1984; the average term of imprisonment was three years.

RESTRICTIVE NEW LAWS

As early as January, the Soviet government signalled its adherence to harsh policies on dissent by passing two repressive changes in the laws. It is now a criminal offense to disclose information from the workplace to foreigners. Divulging to foreigners "professional secrets" is now punishable by up to eight years of imprisonment. A second change relates to the definition of "anti-Soviet agitation" under Article 70 RSFSR Criminal Code. The new definition includes not only the preparation and dissemination of "detrimental" materials, but also mere possession of such works. Another provision specifies that those found guilty under Article 70 using "money or other valuables from foreign organizations or persons acting in (their) interest" can now be imprisoned for up to 15 (rather than 12) years.

In July 1984, a USSR Supreme Soviet decree fixed penalties of up to 100 rubles for Soviet citizens who violate "rules for stay in the USSR by foreign citizens or stateless persons" or provide shelter, transportation or "other services" to foreigners without official permission. Although the decree did not extend the range of illegal actions, its promulgation called attention to heightened Kremlin concern over contacts between Soviet citizens and foreigners.

Another new Soviet regulation issued in August and effective in October 1984 forbids foreigners from pre-paying often exorbitant tariffs on packages sent to Soviet citizens. This regulation ended a 30-year Soviet policy under which foreign friends and relatives could send clothing and food through special package companies which accepted pre-payment. This new restriction will especially affect families of POCs, religious believers and refuseniks, since they now must pay high tariffs and there is no longer guaranteed delivery of parcels from abroad.

The new trial of Russian Orthodox POC Vladimir Poresh was on October 23, 1984. It marked the first known instance of the application of a new article 188.3 RSFSR Criminal Code, "Malicious Disobedience of the Administration of Corrective Labor Institutions" with a possible five-year term. The new law—promulgated in late September 1983 one week after the close of the Madrid CSCE Meeting—authorizes administrators of penal institutions to charge inmates with "malicious disobedience to its lawful demands" if the prisoner had already been punished for another such infraction during the previous year. Poresh, arrested in Chistopol Prison one day before the end of his term, was given a new three-year prison term for four peaceful protests against denial of prisoners' rights. There are fears that at least two other Soviet POCs, Russian samizdat author Viktor Grinev and Byelorussian activist Mikhail Kukobaka also may face charges under this new so-called "Eternal Prisoner" law.

ISOLATION AND BRUTAL TREATMENT OF POLITICAL PRISONERS

During 1984 the Soviet government intensified its policy of isolating political prisoners in the gulag. One technique frequently used is to deny prisoners their legal rights to family visits—often for years in advance. For example, imprisoned Lithuanian Helsinki Monitor Viktoras Petkus has had no family visits since August 1983.

In addition, greater official reliance on violence against POCs—not to speak of ordinary prisoners—was discernible in 1984. The deaths of at least seven POCs during the year provided tragic testimony to this fact. Three noted Ukrainian human rights activists, Oleksy Tykhy, Valery Marchenko and Yury Lytvyn died in Perm Camp 36/1, the only POC special regimen camp. Two other human rights activists, Aleksei Nikitin—who protested dangerous working conditions for Donetsk coal miners—and well-known camp poet Valentin Sokolov, died after extended maltreatment in Soviet psychiatric hospitals. Seventy-two-year-old Ukrainian Catholic Anton Potochnyk died on May 29 in camp while serving his fifth term. Another religious activist, Baptist Boris Artyushenko, died in Kursk prison in December during his fourth term of imprisonment. Conditions of incarceration have deteriorated so much that veteran POC Yury Lytvyn was reportedly driven to suicide. Imprisoned peace activist Aleksandr Shatravka also attempted suicide in May 1984.

Other evidence of increased cruelty is suggested by reports of the extremely poor health of numerous POCs. Eduard Arutunyan, founder of the Armenian Helsinki Group, is reportedly suffering from extreme malnutrition and had one lung removed in prison hospital. At least two POCs suffered heart attacks. Thirty-nine-year-old Baptist rock musician Valery Barinov—sentenced to two and a half years in camp on November 23 in Leningrad—suffered a massive heart attack one week later. Pentecostal emigration activist Vasily Barats suffered two heart attacks in Perm Camp 36/1. Two leading Jewish activists, Anatoly Shcharansky and Iosif Begun, are in precarious health, partially due to hunger strikes protest extended terms of punishment isolation.

There were also more frequent reports of increased brutality by the administration of Soviet penal institutions in 1984, including more instances of beatings of POCs in the camps and even in pre-trial detention in Moscow. The gifted Ukrainian-Polish poet, Irina Ratushinskaya, spent 39 days in solitary confinement, was twice hospitalized for tuberculosis and was beaten and force-fed while on hunger strike. Dr. Anatoly Koryagin, advisor to the Psychiatric Working Group, was beaten in Chistopol prison with the door of his cell open so that others would hear his screams; he reportedly is near death after a prolonged hunger strike. Baptist minister Mikhail Khorev spent 17 days in special isolation and two months in camp prison in mid-1984 for not properly greeting a camp commandant. Khorev, who is nearly blind, was also deprived of his glasses. Sergi Grigoryants, a samizdat editor in Chistopol prison, was so badly beaten by wardens that his arm was broken. In late December, Jewish activist Iosif Berenshtein lost the use of his right eye after being beaten by prison wardens; the prison authorities in Zhitomir, Ukraine claim he poked his out with a potato peeler.

PSYCHIATRIC ABUSE

In April 1983, the Soviet Union withdrew from the World Psychiatric Association to avoid an expected censure motion in July. Some hoped that this move signalled increased Soviet sensitivity to criticism of their abuse of psychiatry for political purposes. Soviet actions in 1984, however, soon proved these hopes to be unfounded. Among the Soviet human rights activists subjected to psychiatric abuse in 1984 are: Bashkir poet Nizametdin Akhmetov, in camp since 1969, sent to the Alma Ata special psychiatric hospital in June; Armenian human rights activist Garnik Tsarukyan, an Armenian Apostolic Church deacon, sent to a psychiatric hospital in February for criticism of church authorities; Leningrad samizdat writer Oleg Okhapkin, hospitalized in late August; Latvian Catholic Sandra Riga, editor of a samizdat ecumenical journal Summons, tried in August and sent for forcible psychiatric treatment; Yuri Popov of the Moscow youth peace "Good Will Group" placed in psychiatric hospital this year; and Russian worker Viktor Tsurikov who was held in psychiatric hospital in Krasnoyarsk for the month of April for refusing to vote.

One of the most tragic cases of psychiatric abuse is that of Ukrainian poet, Viktor Rafalsky, who has spent 15 years in Soviet psychiatric hospitals. Last year, Rafalsky escaped from the hospital, was recaptured and put on trial on February 27. Ruled "especially dangerous and requiring forced medical treatment," he was sent to the infamous Dnepropetrovsk special psychiatric hospital. While there, Rafalsky managed to smuggle out an appeal to the West reporting that letters from Amnesty International had eased his conditions and asking that Western assistance be more systematic and regular.

THE ANTI-SAMIZDAT CAMPAIGN

Another aspect of the Soviet crackdown on dissent in 1984 was an intensified campaign against all forms of samizdat. Among the victims was Lithuanian chemist Lyudas Dambrauskas who was sentenced on October 3 to five and a half years of imprisonment for writing memoirs about his 25 years in Stalinist camps. Several activists were sentenced for reproducing Western literature: Although Mikhail Polyakov confessed his "guilt," he still received a five-year camp term in April in Leningrad. Mikhail Meylakh, a Leningrad literary scholar, was also sentenced in April; he received a ten-year camp term for distributing Western publications of works by Akhmatova, Mandelshtam and Nabokov. Literary archivist Aleksandr Bogoslovsky was arrested in June for "making notes of an anti-Soviet nature" in his notebook and for giving foreign books to his uncle and two friends. Veteran Moscow human rights activist Yuri Shikhanovich was sentenced in September to a ten-year term for alleged involvement with the samizdat Chronicle of Current Events and for passing information to the West.

A number of religious activists who participated in samizdat activities were also arrested in 1984 including the Latvian Catholic editor Sandra Riga. Russian Orthodox activist, Sergei Markus, was sentenced in July 1984 to three years in camp for possessing religious literature—which was later ordered burned. Despite this drive against samizdat, new publications appeared in 1984: at least eight issues of the Chronicle of the Catholic Church in Ukraine. This new samizdat journal, first issued in March, reports on the situation of religious and national rights advocates in Western Ukraine.

Several unregistered Baptists have also been imprisoned for religious samizdat. Viktor Savelev was arrested in Georgia in February for transporting unauthorized Baptist materials and Estonian Baptist, Pavel Vezikov, was sentenced in May to two years in camp for circulating religious samizdat and Western Christian literature. The arrest of two brothers, Egor and Andrei Volf in Kazakhstan on November 24 reveals the the massive scale of underground printing of Baptist literature in the USSR. The authorities found 30,000 printed Bibles, three tons of blank paper, and a portable printing press. This is the fourth such KGB raid against the unofficial Baptist "Christian Press" in the last ten years.

Perhaps one of the clearest demonstrations of the Kremlin effort to cut the flow of samizdat materials to the West was the arrest of long-time Moscow human rights activist, Lina Tumanova. As Tumanova met two U.S. diplomats on a Moscow street on July 4, 1984, she was arrested and the officials were detained. A package of samizdat was seized from Tumanova and she faces charges of "anti-Soviet agitation and propaganda." She was released from prison in September for medical treatment and will still stand trial. The case received much negative publicity in the Soviet press—in an obvious warning to other Soviet citizens.

FURTHER EMIGRATION RESTRICTIONS

Emigration rates for all three Soviet nationalities which previously had been permitted to leave the USSR have reached new lows. Only 897 Soviet Jews were allowed to emigrate in 1984—compared to 1,315 in 1983 and 51,471 in the record year of 1979. A total of 913 Soviet Germans arrived in West Germany in 1984. Armenian emigration rates have also plummeted. Any Soviet citizen may face imprisonment if he or she presses emigration claims with Soviet authorities. Soviet citizens who are caught crossing USSR borders without official permission are given lengthy camp terms. At the same time emigration from the USSR came to a virtual standstill, there were signs that the Soviet authorities had embarked on a campaign to lure some high-profile Soviet defectors, including soldiers, back to the USSR with promises of no punishment.

REPRESSION OF RELIGIOUS ACTIVISTS

During 1984, the Soviet authorities kept up, and in some cases, intensified their campaign against religious activists. In addition to those already mentioned, numerous other leaders of various religious denominations were imprisoned during the year. In June, a Lutheran preacher, Jakob Rein, was sentenced in Kazakhstan to five years in camp for allegedly organizing unregistered religious services. Later in the year, two Russian Orthodox priests were sentenced on doubtful charges: Father Nikolai Temirbaev was given a two-year camp term in Turkmenia for allegedly beating his wife, and a popular youth priest, 44-year-old Pavel Lysak, was sentenced in December to ten months imprisonment for living in Moscow without a residence permit. A Lithuanian Catholic priest, Father Jonas Kastytus Matulionis, was arrested on November 9 on unknown charges. He had been previously jailed in 1976 for nine months for alleged involvement with the unofficial Chronicle of the Catholic Church in Lithuania. A Baptist preacher, Peter Peters, was sentenced to three years in camp in May.

Various religious communities felt the heavy hand of state authorities in 1984. A resurgence of interest among Soviet Jews in their religious heritage has led to increased anti-Semitic repression. Among the methods of intimidation used by the KGB were allegations that Jews use drugs in their religious rituals. For example, Moscow Jewish activist Yuli Edelshtein, arrested on trumped-up charges of drug possession, was sentenced on December 18 to three years in labor camp. Moshe Abramov, and Orthodox Jewish activist from Samarkand, received a three-year camp term for "hooliganism." One result of the official drive against Soviet Baptists was 46 arrests in 1984. Unregistered Soviet Adventists suffered at least six arrests in the first six months of the year. One such Adventist, Vladimir Vasilchenko, was jailed for recording foreign radio broadcasts. The continuing campaign against Soviet Pentecostals attempting to emigrate from the USSR was revealed in two month-long hunger strikes undertaken by 55 Pentecostals—mostly of German origin—in the Pacific coast town of Chuguevka. One Chuguevka Pentecostal pastor, Viktor Valter, was arrested on December 10—International Human Rights Day.

CAMPAIGN AGAINST UNOFFICIAL GROUPS

Independent peace groups, monitoring activists and other non-conformists continued to come under attack in 1984. Members of the unofficial Group to Promote Trust Between the U.S.S.R. and the U.S.—which claims some 2,000 supporters among affiliate groups in Leningrad, Kiev, Odessa, Novosibirsk, Riga, Rybinsk and Tallinn—were subjected to various forms of harassment, intimidation and detention.

As a result of an earlier KGB campaign, most Soviet Helsinki Monitoring Groups have ceased to exist. There are currently 45 imprisoned Group members. Nevertheless, two Helsinki-affiliated religious rights groups function: the Catholic Committee in Lithuania and the Action Group for the Defense of the Rights of Believers and the Ukrainian Catholic Church. The latter group, formed on September 9, 1982 and led by former Ukrainian POC, Iosyp Terelya, has allied itself to the Helsinki process. The Soviet authorities took action against three other Helsinki activists in 1984: Elena

Bonner, a Moscow Helsinki Group founding member and the wife of Andrei Sakharov, was sentenced on August 17 to five years of internal exile for "anti-Soviet slander"; a Ukrainian Helsinki Monitor, Mykola Gorbal, was re-arrested in camp on October 21 for "anti-Soviet slander"—days before his scheduled release; and another Ukrainian Monitor, Iosif Zisels, was arrested in Chernivtsi on October 19 on unknown charges.

SUPPRESSION OF NATIONAL AND CULTURAL RIGHTS

The Soviet government continued to act against advocates of greater national, ethnic and cultural rights for dozens of nationalities in its domain. In the fall, a stepped-up campaign against unofficial Hebrew teachers and Jewish cultural activists was initiated. Among the 12 currently imprisoned are: 34-year-old Aleksandr Kholmiansky, arrested in July on hooliganism charges; Yakov Levin of Odessa, arrested five days before his wedding and sentenced on November 20 to three years in camp for "anti-Soviet slander"; Iosif Berenshtein of Kiev who was sentenced on December 10 to four years in camp for allegedly "assaulting a police officer." Despite these measures, 1984 saw a resurgence of interest in Jewish culture with unofficial Hebrew and Jewish culture groups springing up in at least 30 Soviet cities.

In 1983 there were official celebrations to mark the 200th anniversary of the Treaty of Georgievsk which joined Georgia to Russia. Three Georgian workers, Zakarii Lashkarashvili, Tarial Ghviniashvili and Guram Gogopaidze, were tried in March and given terms ranging from four to five years for preparing leaflets protesting this celebration.

Armenian human rights activists also continued to feel the KGB heavy hand. Armenian Helsinki Monitor Robert Nazaryan is in Chistopol prison, while Armenian national rights advocate Paruir Airikyan was sent into internal exile in February.

Mustafa Dzhemilev, leader of the struggle of 500,000 Crimean Tatars to return to their Crimean homeland from Stalinist exile in Central Asia, was sentenced on February 10 to three years in strict regimen camp for "anti-Soviet slander." This represents Dzhemilev's sixth prison term on political charges. Dzhemilev's "crime" consisted of maintaining contacts with Crimean Tatars in New York. At least two other Crimean Tatar activists, Dzhelyal Chelebiev and Izzet Khairov, were arrested last year.

In the Baltic states of Latvia, Estonia and Lithuania, human and national rights advocates also faced harsh repression by the Kremlin. A leading Estonian activist, Enn Tarto, was tried in April and given a ten-year term in special regimen camp. His "crimes" included signing protests, publishing and distributing human rights documents in Estonia, and maintaining contacts with Estonian emigres in Sweden. Recent imprisonments in Lithuania include those of Father Matulionis and of Lyudas Dambrauskas. Finally, the fate of one leading Latvian dissident, Gunars Astra, is a fitting commentary on the overall Kremlin attitude towards 1984: in December 1983, he was given a 12-year term of imprisonment for circulating George Orwell's visionary novel, 1984.●

THE ARMY'S EFFORTS TO REFORM

● Mr. HART. Mr. President, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues a very important article from the April 21 New York Times. The article is titled, "Army Survey Finds Officers Critical." It reports on a recent survey by the Army of its own officer corps, a survey that revealed some problems. According to the article, the findings reflect a belief by half of those surveyed that the bold, original, creative officer cannot survive in today's Army.

Mr. President, I am certain some people will use this study to criticize the Army. Instead, I want to praise the Army for conducting this analysis. The Army has courageously overcome the tendency, natural in any large institution, to sweep problems under the rug, and has instead attempted to bring them to light so they can be resolved. By doing so, the leadership of the Army has shown that it is sincere in its efforts to reform itself. It is a praiseworthy step, and one that should strengthen, not weaken, our support for the Army.

The Army's serious and highly important effort at self-reform has been evident for some time to many members of the military reform movement. It has thus far included the publication of an excellent new basic field manual, the 1982 edition of FM 100-5, that makes maneuver warfare official doctrine; the establishment of what is, in my view, the best course in the whole American military education establishment, the new second-year course at Ft. Leavenworth; and the Cohort and regimental system programs to improve unit cohesion. Now, there is an addition to that list: the survey reported by the Times.

Mr. President, our other armed services should follow the Army's lead. Their need for reform is no less; in the case of the Navy, it is in fact greater. But the services continue to pretend that the problems and deficiencies they face do not exist. Unfortunately, that means they could possibly be brought to light in combat, at the cost of unnecessary casualties and, very possibly, tragic defeats.

The Army, in contrast, is preparing itself for future success in combat by addressing its problems in time of peace. I strongly urge my colleagues, especially those who have joined with me in supporting military reform, to show the Army that we understand, appreciate, and support what it is doing.

Mr. President, I ask that the article, "Army Survey Finds Officers Critical," be printed in the RECORD.

ARMY SURVEY FINDS OFFICERS CRITICAL

(By Richard Halloran)

WASHINGTON, April 20.—The Army's officers, in a remarkably candid self-evaluation, have expressed severe criticism of themselves, the Army and its senior leaders.

In a confidential Army survey of its officer corps, taken last fall and analyzed over the winter, half the officers who answered a long questionnaire agreed that "the bold, original, creative officer cannot survive in today's Army."

A report compiled from the survey said an even larger portion of the officers, 68 percent, agreed that "the officer corps is focused on personal gain rather than selflessness"—a virtue that military leaders cite as essential to good leadership.

In addition, nearly half the generals, who were questioned in a separate survey but whose answers were incorporated into the report, concluded that "senior Army leaders behave too much like corporate executives and not enough like warriors."

And one-third of all the officers, including the generals, thought that "most officers are promoted before becoming competent at their existing grade levels," the report said.

Despite these negative views, large majorities of the officers said that they were satisfied with their duty positions, that they intended to stay in the Army for a career and that fellow officers exemplified the "warrior spirit" and the "Army ethic."

Large majorities also said "the Army is more than a job" and "individual needs are secondary to Army needs." Although the officers had complaints about particular elements of the Army's educational and training system, they generally gave it good marks.

The survey was ordered by the Army Chief of Staff, Gen. John A. Wickham Jr., who said in a letter to those being queried, "Because this study will shape the future development of our officer corps, we need your candid opinions."

The state of the officer corps has been a contentious issue within and outside the Army since American forces withdrew from Vietnam more than 10 years ago. Military and civilian critics have asserted that officers emphasized management over leadership and corporate values over traditional military values.

The survey report was compiled from answers to two long questionnaires. The first was sent to all 436 serving officers in the four grades of general, of whom 333 replied; the second was sent to 23,000 randomly selected officers, from colonel down to lieutenant, of whom 14,046 replied. In those six grades are 92,000 officers. No estimate of the range of sampling error was provided in the report.

The results were tabulated into a report stamped "For Official Use Only" and "Close Hold," meaning that the information in the survey was not to be disseminated widely.

DEMANDS ON OFFICERS CITED

The Armed Forces Journal, a monthly magazine specializing in military matters that is published here, obtained a copy of the survey and has prepared an article for publication in its May issue. An advance copy of the article and the report were made available to The New York Times.

Evidently anticipating renewed criticism, the Army prepared a discussion paper to accompany the report.

"We place a tremendous burden on our senior Army leaders," the paper said. "We charge them to perform as statesmen, as spokesmen for their organizations, as stewards of tremendous resources, as role models, as standard setters, as long-range planners and decision makers. In short, we demand they perform as though they were effective corporate executives.

"In time of peace, there is a blurring of the distinction between pure 'warrior' and 'pure corporate executive.' In both peace and across the spectrum of conflict, we expect our senior Army leaders to be both."

Lieut. Gen. Charles W. Bagnai, who organized the survey, said it was part of a larger effort to improve the professional development of the officers corps. "We asked some real tough questions about strengths and weaknesses," he said in a telephone interview, "to see where we should be going in the future."

WORK ON RECOMMENDATIONS

Lieut. Gen. Arthur E. Brown, Jr., director of the Army Staff, which is preparing recommendations for General Wickham based on the survey said changes in the Army's system of educating officers in their careers were under serious consideration.

In each of the junior, middle and senior service schools, more emphasis would probably be put on teaching officers to be better mentors and coaches of their subordinates, General Brown said.

The findings of the survey suggested that the Army officer corps had not entirely recovered from the dark days of Vietnam. When morale was down, ethics were slighted and many officers put premotion ahead of duty, according to historians of the Vietnam War.

The survey responses also appeared to reflect the questioning attitude discerned in many younger officers, the majors and captains who were commissioned in the post-Vietnam period of the late 1970's. They brought into the Army the skepticism of their youth in the turbulent 1960's.

DIFFERING VIEWS OF GENERALS

Several marked differences between the generals and the lower-ranking officers showed up in the survey. The generals, the report said, thought the officer corps was less focused on personal gain than on "selflessness"; lower-ranking officers disagreed.

The generals said they felt that about two-thirds of the captains and lieutenants would make good wartime leaders, while the captains and lieutenants themselves rated only half of their peers as potentially good battlefield commanders.

The generals also thought that the Army was preparing officers to keep pace with weapons of advanced technology, while large numbers of the other officers disagreed, the report said. The lower-ranking officers also wanted more of their peers to receive advanced military education than the generals thought was necessary.

On the other hand, the report said generals and the other officers agreed that "the weakest areas of officer preparation tend to be warfighting, leadership and critical thinking." They also agreed that two-thirds of the colonels and majors would be good combat commanders.●

ARKANSAS' FIRST PRESIDENTIAL VOLUNTEER ACTION AWARD WINNERS

● Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, earlier this week two distinguished Arkansans joined the ranks of recipients of the Presidential Volunteer Action Award—the first ever from our State. Rev. Hezekiah D. Davis Stewart, Jr. and Dr. Kelsy Caplinger III were honored at the White House along with 16 others from across the Nation.

I had the opportunity to meet with both these deserving individuals to let them know how proud all Arkansans are of their dedication and service to those less fortunate.

The Arkansas Gazette carried a story about Dr. Stewart's and Dr. Caplinger's experiences upon receiving this award and I want to share it with my colleagues. Their words sum up much better than I could what volunteerism is all about. I ask that the article be printed in the RECORD.

ARKANSANS GET AWARDS FROM REAGAN, CITE HELP

(By Carol Matlack)

WASHINGTON.—Rev. Hezekiah D. David Stewart Jr. and Dr. Kelsy Caplinger III, the first Arkansas residents ever to win the Presidential Volunteer Action Awards, said Monday that hundreds of other persons in Arkansas deserved to share the honor with them.

Mr. Stewart, who established a self-help program in College Station, and Dr. Caplinger, an allergist who founded a summer camp for youths with medical problems, were among 18 persons who received the awards from President Reagan Monday at a White House luncheon.

After dining on roast duck and rice in the East Room, each received a silver medallion on a red-white-and-blue ribbon from the president.

In interviews afterward, both said their volunteer projects would not have succeeded without help from many others.

"ONLY AS A REPRESENTATIVE"

"I cannot accept this award for me, but only as a representative of all the volunteer efforts on the part of everybody who has assisted us," Mr. Stewart said. "I thank God and the people of Arkansas for giving me an opportunity to share, to care and to love."

ESTABLISHED PROJECT

Mr. Stewart, the pastor of Mount Nebo AME Church in College Station, established a community self-help project called Watershed that offers counseling, job referral and other services, as well as emergency food, clothing and shelter for residents of the predominantly poor, black community. He said numerous individuals, organizations and companies had donated time and money to the Watershed project over the years.

Dr. Caplinger, of Little Rock, is chairman of the Arkansas Chapter of the American Academy of Pediatrics and is the founder of Med-Camp of Arkansas, which since 1971 has offered a summer program for youths with medical problems at Camp Aldersgate in western Little Rock.

HELPED RAISE FUNDS

Dr. Caplinger helped raise money to build an infirmary and other special facilities at the camp, and recruited health professionals and others to work as volunteers each summer. The camp is operated without federal funds, and more than 2,000 youths have attended since it began.

"I'm very grateful even to be nominated" for the award, Dr. Caplinger said in an interview. "To receive it really adds a great deal of credibility to the program * * * and enhances our visibility." However, he added that the program could not have succeeded without hundreds of others volunteering their time. "I'm really accepting this on their behalf," he said.

APPEARS ON "TODAY"

Besides attending the White House ceremony, Dr. Caplinger appeared briefly on the NBC television "Today Show" Monday morning.

More than 1,800 individuals and groups were nominated for the presidential volunteer awards this year. A total of six individuals, nine private organizations, two corporations and a group of labor unions received the awards.●

FORMER GUARDSMEN IN THE FDN

● Mr. DENTON. Mr. President, during Tuesday's debate about the President's proposal to aid the Contras, a great many charges were made against the Contras, especially the Nicaraguan Democratic Force [FDN]. One of the allegations most often repeated in the Senate and in the House of Representatives was the charge that the FDN is comprised of Somocistas, meaning—in this case—former members of Somoza's National Guard. Specifically, 46 out of 48 of the FDN's leadership were said to be former guardsmen.

I have checked with the Department of State. I have checked with the FDN and reviewed their list of regional and task force commanders, and I have discussed the matter with the distinguished chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee, Senator DURENBURGER. I believe that it is important that an effort be made to set the record straight on the issue.

Former Somoza National Guardsmen do not dominate, control, or represent either the leadership of the FDN or the FDN at large. Furthermore, in the best American tradition, the military command structure of the FDN is subordinate to civilian political authority.

The FDN has a six-man policymaking directorate. The five civilians on the board are the following: Adolfo Calero, a businessman who was a longtime opponent of Somoza and was imprisoned by him in 1978 for organizing a general strike; Indalecio Rodriquez, who was a member of the FSLN for 20 years; Lucia Salazar, the widow of Jorge Salazar, the former president of the Nicaraguan Superior Council on Private Enterprise [COSEP] who was murdered by Sandinista agents in November 1980; Alfonsin Callejas, who resigned—in protest—as Somoza's Vice President in 1972 and was cleared of any wrongdoing by the FSLN following its July 1979 triumph; and, finally, Marcos Zeledon, an activist in opposition party politics during the Somoza years.

Colonel Enrique Bermudez, a former member of the National Guard and Somoza's military attache in Washington, is the sixth member of the directorate. I should point out that Anastasio Somoza had a well-known practice of assigning persons he did not trust to overseas posts. Such was the case for Colonel Bermudez. Along with Rodriquez and Calero, Bermudez is also a member of the three man civil-military command, which oversees day-to-day military operations and is answerable to the directorate.

Under the civil-military command is the strategic command, which directs military operations under Colonel Bermudez. No decision on day-to-day operations, however, is made without the concurrence of the civil-military command.

The FDN has 56 regional and task force commanders. Forty-three percent, or 27 of them, are former Sandinistas. Only 32 percent of the FDN's military leadership are former guardsmen. Thirteen of the regional and task force commanders are former guardsmen, all under the rank of lieutenant. Twelve of them are campesinos and the remainder come from a variety of professions: Medical doctor, evangelical minister, university student, and a civilian radio technician. The average age is 24 to 26 years.

The estimated troop strength of the FDN is 15,000. Less than 2 percent of these, or approximately 200 to 260, are former guardsmen, and none of them held a rank above first lieutenant. The overwhelming number of FDN troops are simple peasants, workers, shopkeepers, businessmen, and students who had no previous ties at all with Somoza.

Having said this, I would like to point out that merely being a former member of Somoza's national guard is not an indictment. Some of them were mere traffic cops, and a good many never committed atrocities.

The FDN has come a long way since it was first organized. Its nature and character has changed as the objectives of the Sandinista regime have become clearly apparent. The organization has been frank about the changes in its political and military structure. In 1982, it purged its organization of those former guardsmen who had a record of human rights abuse. The FDN maintains active discipline in its ranks and has dismissed or disciplined members in its ranks who have not acted in accordance with its code of conduct.

I believe it is time for the Congress to make its decision about Contra funding on the basis of accurate information rather than disinformation. To do otherwise does not serve our national interest, and it certainly does not help the people of Nicaragua, who are laboring under a repressive, totalitarian, Marxist regime. The Sandinistas have made a mockery of the sacrifice of the Nicaraguan people to find freedom, Democracy, and prosperity.

I believe that the United States Government, both the executive branch and the legislative branch, should clearly and without hesitation support the many men and women in Nicaragua who are willing to continue to make the great sacrifice for that most precious of all human rights—liberty.●

HIGHER EDUCATION

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, the Federal commitment in higher education since the 1965 enactment of the Higher Education Act has been to access and quality in institutions of higher education. Since the mid-1940's the Federal Government has first, through the GI bill, extended access and provided some measure of choice to veteran, low- and middle-income students, and student dependents of disabled, deceased, and elderly Social Security recipients.

The compromise package, agreed upon among some of my distinguished Republican colleagues and the Reagan administration, contains provisions which will heighten and exacerbate the division between public and private higher education. The proposal's inclusion of an $8,000 annual mega-cap on title IV, student assistance, reverses a 30-year commitment to access and choice in higher education. Are we recanting on our obligations to ensure equity and quality for all students in higher education, or are we saying we can spend $2.2 billion on MX missile deployment and almost $6 billion for a single aircraft carrier, but not an equal amount to guarantee the development of our most important natural resources—the minds of our people?

Colleges and universities continue to struggle with the benefits and burdens of providing access. A recent report, "Integrity in the College Curriculum," describes the nature of the problems we face because of unsatisfactory preparation of many high school students in terms of their reading and writing proficiencies. While our long-term objective must be to improve learning of the basic skills in our elementary and secondary schools, we cannot ignore the current crop of high school students who are entering college.

In fact, they are not being ignored. Colleges and universities across America include among their faculties so-called developmental educators. Many students come to college ill-prepared to do college-level work. That deficiency is being partially addressed.

I ask to have printed in the RECORD two articles, "Teaching Basic Skills to College Students," from the Chronicle of Higher Education, and "College on the Rebound," from the April 4, 1985, Cleveland Plain Dealer. Both of these articles outline the need for these special programs and their success in increasing retention and graduation of underprepared students.

The articles follow:

TEACHING BASIC SKILLS TO COLLEGE STUDENTS

(By Nancy Rabianski-Carriuolo)

Many terms have a somewhat negative connotation for professors, and some—such as "budget freeze," "student strike," and even "basic skills"—tend to elicit a slight curl of the lip. My lip curls sometimes, too, but not when it comes to basic skills.

In my experience as a supervisor of developmental programs and as a high-school teacher and later professor of basic English, I have found that because under-prepared students are studying basic skills they are often viewed as not really belonging in college, as having been accepted only to meet enrollment goals.

In reality, such students are much more difficult to categorize, because, in terms of standardized-test scores and psychological characteristics, they vary from campus to campus, depending on each institution's standards. Basically they are students who in one or more areas—usually math, English, study skills, or some combination of the three—do not qualify for mainstream college classes.

Although such students are all deficient in at least one basic skill, the reasons for their deficiency vary widely. As children they may have had a physical impairment, for example, most often because of an undiagnosed need for eyeglasses; or they may have not been developmentally ready to learn reading and writing when they were first taught. They may have lacked motivation because of personal problems or other reasons. They may even have been the victims of poor teaching. In any event, whatever the reason for the deficiencies, most underprepared college students have two things in common: They are weak in basic skills and they are now motivated to improve.

Developmental programs have been around a long time—since the early land-grant colleges in the 1860's—but Americans in general were not much concerned until the last decade, when the back-to-basics movement was widely publicized. When even Ivy League campuses acknowledged providing "bonehead English" classes, professors everywhere began to shake their heads over the quality of the students they were receiving from the high schools; high-school teachers began to protest that they couldn't teach in four short years everything that had been neglected in elementary school; and elementary-school teachers complained about that enemy of education, the television set. No one wants to claim responsibility for the seeming decline in student preparedness, but everyone wants to improve education to the point where basic-skills classes are not needed beyond elementary school.

Programs have been developed, particularly in the last year or so, to raise education standards and remediate where necessary. I applaud such efforts, but as long as we continue to evaluate students comparatively, there will always be a bottom half of every class, and many of the students in that half will want to continue their education. Therefore, successful programs of the sort described by the Department of Education in A Nation Responds will not result in basic-skills classes disappearing from our campuses. Rather, education reform will bring about higher standards in schools and colleges and, as a result, higher exit standards in developmental classes.

There have always been and there always will be students who don't reach some academic standard. Consequently, let us look at the real question: Should you welcome such students to your campus—and to your own class? (I am sure we all agree it is un-American to deny anyone an education, but we might suggest that an underprepared student try the college down the street.) Are developmental students teachable? Are they worth the effort? Or are they just admitted to college because they pay tuition and, therefore, indirectly pay our salaries?

I have pondered, discussed, and argued those questions with many colleagues, and most of them respond with another: "How can I teach my subject to someone weak in basic language (or computation) skills?" They know the task is not impossible—just not easy.

Even the brightest students have some gaps in their academic training, so my answer is to pretest everyone to discover each student's level of ability before beginning to teach the course. Most campuses have a developmental program or learning center able to assess skills and provide tutoring—if not, teachers can design their own tests, including whatever they think is necessary as a prerequisite for their course.

Early identification and referral for assistance if you don't have time to tutor them yourself are important to the students' success. (If you are feeling resentful at my suggestion that teachers should spend time on pretesting and referrals, remember that in the long run you will be saving time and avoiding frustration for yourself and your students if you insure that they get needed help before they fail either the midterm exam or the entire course.)

There are also ways your teaching can help students who have academic difficulties. Poor self-image is common among such students and often results in problems with performance and attendance. If you really want them to attend your classes regularly and work to the best of their abilities, you must help them see improvement in their work, proof that they are moving toward a goal. One of my students last semester wailed at the midpoint of the course: "I study and study but I still can't get those verb endings right!" I used his pretest to show him that while in September he had made 20 errors in a 200-word essay, in November he had made only 5 in a 300-word essay. He had not been aware of his improvement; obviously I had not given him enough feedback.

Students also need to be taught how to learn—by all of their teachers, not just developmental specialists. For example, follow the announcement of the first test with a discussion of test anxiety and ways to cope with it. Students should also be familiarized with their textbooks. I am certain you chose your test for sound reasons; if you share those reasons with your students, your teaching strategies can become their learning strategies. Students often don't notice or don't know how to benefit from special features such as vocabulary lists and answer keys to exercises. Pointing out such features often helps insure the book will actually be used rather than stored away and sold at the end of the semester in virginal condition.

A complaint I hear occasionally is that teaching students with weak skills takes so much additional time and effort. That may be, but are we teaching or are we just providing the materials that teach? Some students understand a concept immediately, but for others we have to stop and explain a different way and yet another way until we run out of explanations. The students who understood the concept immediately could probably have learned it just as well by reading the textbook; the others are the ones we were really teaching, by using every strategy we could think of to refer the new material to former knowledge or experience.

It is equally important to use a variety of instructional approaches. Not all students have the same style of learning. Some are good readers; others learn more from listening; still others respond well to actual manipulation of the material—for example, there are students who get a C or lower in science class but do B or even A work in the lab. Providing a variety of approaches insures that the needs of all students will be met, and there is probably someone on your campus who can help in preparing instructional materials. If not, the National Association for Development Education can recommend consultants in many areas of the country.

Although no one has ever actually asked me if difficult-to-teach students are worth the effort, I have occasionally asked myself that question after a particularly frustrating day. In considering my question, I think about my own struggle to achieve computer literacy and of the varied professionals who once experienced difficulty with a basic skill. Any developmental educator can tell you success stories about former students and will appreciate your interest and support if you ask. Discussing such students, especially on a frustrating day, will confirm that developmental students are indeed worth a little extra effort.

COLLEGE ON THE REBOUND

(By Naomi Barnett)

Why is Jim, a 34-year-old man, going to college for a course in reading? And why is a college teaching reading?

As an instructor of reading and study skills at a college, these are the types of questions I am most often asked.

As far back as colonial times, college presidents and their faculties have deplored their students' lack of preparation for the demands of higher education. Those attending college in the early days, of course, were well-to-do and among the most academically able young men of their time. In 1985, college presidents and faculties are still decrying their students' lack of preparation.

Our country has always viewed itself as an open, egalitarian society in which education provides the tools for advancement. Community colleges in particular were established to extend educational opportunities to all.

Open admissions, a concept true since the land grant colleges were established, means serving a non-traditional population, compared with those who attended college before World War II. The students are of all ages, economic statuses, and races; they are of all nationalities so that English is not always their first language, instead of only men or mostly men, women now comprise more than half of the college population; and finally, many students are the first in their families to enroll in college.

Our nation's commitment to these non-traditional students carries with it the obligation to help them succeed in their college courses by providing developmental education. And that is the correct term because it helps advance and develop each student beyond his present level of learning. Many would say it is eupbemistic to call this type of education "developmental" rather than "remedial." But the concept of development is to realize potential, to build on what already exists; remediation, on the other hand, involves correcting a fault or curing a disorder, a totally different idea.

Jim is one of hundreds of non-traditional students at the area's community colleges—Lorain County, Lakeland, and the three campuses of Cuyahoga. A large proportion of these returnees are, like Jim, men in their 30s who have been laid off after 10, 15, or even 20 years of work in one of the local heavy industries. In Jim's case, it was a steel mill.

Unlike some who are no longer employed, Jim decided not to sit by the phone passively waiting for a callback. He was realistic enough to understand that his previous type of job and the skills it required would probably not be available again—ever. Seeing no other alternative, he undertook to find a way of "retooling" to prepare himself for a job that would exist.

His first (and only) reaction was to call a community college, less than five miles from his home, to find out how to enroll in classes. He was immediately given an appointment with a counselor.

Setting foot on the campus was a frightening experience for Jim. He had been a poor student in high school, barely getting enough passing grades to receive a diploma. His friends were equally poor students, who found it easier to boast that they hated school than to make an effort to do well.

The counselor put Jim at ease. She was sensitive to his feeling of insecurity. She explored his interests and his concerns. When he stated a particular interest in the field of electronics, she explained several programs available at the college. Although Jim had not brought a transcript of his high school grades, he quickly admitted that his grades had been low.

The counselor suggested that in view of the long hiatus from high school graduation until the present time, Jim might profit from some developmental courses. She administered some standardized tests to measure Jim's current reading, English and mathematics levels. On the basis of his scores, the counselor strongly suggested that Jim take developmental reading, writing and mathematics.

"You'll find that brushing up on all these skills is necessary before you take other college courses," she explained. "There's no job nowadays that doesn't call for the ability to read and write well. And with your interest in electronics, a good math background is especially important."

The counselor was reassuring. "You may feel a bit rusty at first, but you'll find that after an academic quarter spent here, you'll probably be able to tackle any portion of the microelectronics program successfully."

I met Jim a month after this initial appointment. He was a student in my developmental reading course, in which more than half the students were over 21. In the class, which met for five hours a week, Jim's strengths and weaknesses were diagnosed. In spite of a relatively high vocabulary level, his comprehension measured at about an equivalent to eighth grade.

He and the other 19 students in the class were each assigned to whatever modules or units of work that they seemed to require. Each worked at his own pace, under my guidance, to master the material in the modules. Much of my time, besides helping every student to improve his skills, was to give "injections of confidence." Obviously any praise had to be sincere and warranted by accomplishment.

Jim appreciated being treated like an adult, responsible for completing his work on each module before being evaluated to see if he had indeed mastered the skills listed in the objectives. He found that each session increased his concept of himself as a learner. After his comprehension had improved, Jim undertook to increase his reading speed. By the end of the 11-week quarter, his comprehension was that of a college student and he had doubled his reading skill.

Like Jim, approximately three-quarters of the students enrolled in credit courses at most community colleges are over 21. (The average age in 1984 was 28.) More than 58% are women.

What strengths does this older group of learners bring to their classes? Perhaps the most outstanding feature of the older student is his motivation. He establishes clear-cut, realistic goals for himself as a person, as a student, and as a worker. He is not attending college because his parents have sent him; he has sent himself. He views this trip to school as a road to success, not a mandatory experience. Because of this built-in motivation, the older student, after an initial adjustment, is more apt to stay in school and less apt to fail or drop out than the 18-year-old.

In addition to this sense of purpose, the older student is experienced both in living and in working. He, like Jim, may be married, with children of his own. He has learned to cope with the everyday problems of living, with emergencies, with change itself. He has experienced pain and disappointment. He has had to take responsibility for himself and for others. That commodity affectionately and erroneously termed "common sense" is an attribute of the more mature student.

Finally, the mature student, the one who has picked himself up after hearing the dreaded words, "You're laid off," has proved his resiliency, his power to rise above his problems.

In spite of these strengths, the returning older student is prone to lack one important ingredient: self-confidence. And for good reasons. He's no longer employed; he has discovered that he is unable to land another job without retraining and, worst of all, he is putting himself into a position where he had previously met failure: school.

Given the will to succeed and the support of caring counselors and instructors, Jim and many of his classmates do attain their goals. From the frightened, unsure man who entered my class in September 1984. Jim left in December enjoing reading in particular and learning in general. He convinced his wife that she too should attend college. Jim himself appears destined to be one of the many community college success stories. On the basis of his work in all three developmental courses, it is my prediction that he will experience little difficulty in completing his program in microelectronics. Ultimately, he may even be tempted to transfer to a four-year college for a B.A.

Jim's case history points up the reason for developmental education itself being offered in a college.

Had Jim decided to return to high school for such work, he would have plunged himself back into an atmosphere that would have destroyed whatever self-respect and confidence he possessed. Somehow, the very fact that he was enrolling in a college built his self-esteem. Even if he had needed more than one quarter of compensatory courses before he felt able to enroll in the regular college curriculum, he could tell his laid-off friends, "I'm going to college." Being on campus helped him feel a sense of participation in an institution of higher learning.

In short, attending college becomes in itself, a motivating factor for the Jims who return to school.●

SURVEY OF VIEWS OF ARKANSAS' YOUTH

● Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, I conducted a survey in Arkansas recently, taking a sample of views of high school students in 14 schools across the State. The survey was taken in conjunction with a slide presentation entitled, "A Day in the Life of a Senator," that my staff takes to high schools in the spring and fall each year.

As future voters and leaders of my State, I am interested in their perspectives on the type of leadership President Reagan is providing the country, party identification of these future voters, their ideas on how we can address the Federal deficit, and what concerns them most as young Americans.

I thought my colleagues might be interested in the results of my survey of 1,700 Arkansas civics, government, history, and social studies students. I also thank the students at Sheridan, Stuttgart, Dumas, LakeSide (Lake Village), Bismarck, Glenwood, Mena, Greenwood, Eureka Springs, Huntsville, Morrilton, Atkins, Searcy, and Beebe High Schools for their willing participation.

I submit the survey results for the RECORD.

The survey results follow:

SENATOR PRYOR SURVEYS VIEWS OF ARKANSAS' YOUTH

1. What kind of job do you think President Reagan is doing?

7%, excellent; 33%, very good; 45%, fair; 15%, poor.

2. Which political group do you consider yourself to be a part of?

42%, Democratic Party; 25%, Republican Party; 33%, Independent.

3. If you were President, which of the following programs would you eliminate or cut to help balance the budget?

11%, defense; 2%, Social Security; 3%, highway funds; 11%, food stamps; 2%, health programs; 18%, foreign aid; 3%, agriculture support payments; 2%, student loans; 5%, scientific research grants; 5%, school lunch program; 2%, veterans benefits; 3%, small business loans; 4%, housing assistance; 10%, Federal employee salaries and pensions; 2%, Energy conservation programs; 13%, Amtrak service; 2%, environmental cleanup programs; 3%, Job Corps programs.

(Note: Multiple Answers Allowed)

4. Which of the above programs would you cut first?

(Top 5 Responses) Foreign Aid—27%; Defense—21%; Food Stamps—14%; Amtrak—14%; Federal Employee Salaries—8%.

5. Which of the above programs would you cut last?

(Top 5 Responses) Social Security—24%; Defense—18%; Foreign Aid—9%; Food Stamps—8%, Student Loans—7%.

6. Which of the following concerns you most as a young Arkansan?

24%, drug abuse among young people; 31%, threat of nuclear war; 29%, ability to get a job after graduation; 16%, ability to go to college.

7. If you were President for one day and had the chance to meet any individual in the world, whom would you invite to the White House?

(Top Response) Gorbachev, 23%.●

SENATE DEMOCRATIC WORKING GROUP ON TRADE POLICY

● Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, the Senate Democratic Working Group on Trade Policy released their initial report this morning. It attempts to lay the groundwork for a comprehensive, coordinated trade strategy for the United States.

Our lack of a trade strategy is costing us jobs. According to a Library of Congress study, an increase of only 10 percent in our exports 2 years ago would have meant jobs for 800,000 more Americans today.

Our lack of a trade strategy threatens the economic recovery and that, too, threatens jobs. If the trade deficit continues to weaken our economy as it did in the first quarter unemployment will climb.

Our lack of a trade strategy mocks efforts to reduce the Federal deficit. President Reagan, on television last night, urged sacrifice of Americans to bring the budget deficit down by $50 billion next year. The surge of imports into this country, by cutting back economic growth, threatens to add far more than $50 billion to this year's budget deficit.

And I do not have to tell you what the Federal deficit, by pushing up interest rates, has added to the trade deficit. It is truly a vicious cycle.

Our timing on the release of this first report—just as the President leaves for the economic summit conference in Europe—is not accidental.

We have what we believe is a clear and vitally important message for him as he departs.

Mr. President, please do not initiate a new round of trade negotiations at the Bonn Summit. You haven't done your homework. We want a new round. There is a compelling need for one. Existing rules of international trade are inadequate to the task. But the United States doesn't have a clear idea of what such negotiations should accomplish and you can bet that our competitors in other countries know exactly what their goals are.

We believe in free trade. We believe that when trade is free it is a powerful engine of economic growth, bringing jobs and prosperity to people in all lands. In recent years, though, a number of nations have abandoned our example in favor of a highly protectionist approach, a new mercantilism that has acted not as an engine but as a brake on growth.

As the leader of the Free World, we cannot let this happen. As we say in this report, the United States must formulate an aggressive trade policy that will set the world back on the path of free trade.

Mr. President, as chairman of the working group, I wish to congratulate the other members of the group, including: Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD of West Virginia, ex officio; RUSSELL B. LONG of Louisiana, ERNEST F. HOLLINGS of South Carolina, DONALD W. RIEGLE, JR. of Michigan, MAX BAUCUS of Montana; FRANK R. LAUTENBERG of New Jersey; TOM HARKIN of Iowa; QUENTIN N. BURDICK of North Dakota; THOMAS F. EAGLETON of Missouri; SPARK M. MATSUNAGA of Hawaii; ALAN J. DIXON of Illinois; JEFF BINGAMAN of New Mexico.

Their time and effort made this report a success. And I congratulate them and the working group staff for their excellent assistance.

Mr. President, I ask that the working groups report on trade policy be printed at this point in the RECORD.

The report follows:

THE NEW GLOBAL ECONOMY: FIRST STEPS IN A U.S. TRADE STRATEGY—PRELIMINARY REPORT OF THE SENATE DEMOCRATIC WORKING GROUP ON TRADE POLICY

[Charts mentioned in report not reproduced in Record]

INTRODUCTION

The trade dilemma

No other country in the world holds as large a percentage of free world exports as the United States, about 15 percent. Japan's share, which is increasing, is still only slightly over 9 percent. West Germany has slightly over 10 percent. No other free world nation comes close to those three. Yet international trade is the weak link in U.S. economic polcy. The largest trade deficit in the largest exporting and importing nation the world has ever known presents the economic dilemma of the decade: Should government help by cutting off imports?

Denying trade relief could leave America stripped of its manufacturing and agricultural capacity, with a human cost in millions of displaced people. Yet, answering every cry for relief will start a firestorm of import barriers here and around the world that could lead to a depression.

Notwithstanding trade deficits for years, Presidents have imposed trade protection mainly as a response to political pressure. The current Administration, which has imposed more trade barriers on U.S. imports than any Administration since the 1920's, is now facing the largest trade deficits ever, without any apparent strategy. We are concerned that the Administration may be forced to respond to a future crisis of the moment, such as a decline in the U.S. economy, by imposing harsh and harmful import overprotection because of the current lack of trade policy direction.

A great trading nation needs a world of trade growth, not trade collapse.

The world's greatest trading nation, a global power with global economic interests, needs a trade policy that is strong and dependable under all circumstances and conditions.

A Trade Policy for the Nation

At the beginning of the 99th Congress, a Senate Democratic Working Group on Trade Policy under the Chairmanship of Senator Lloyd Bentsen of Texas began work on the question of whether U.S. Government policies affecting trade serve the national interest. This preliminary report contains the conclusions developed thus far.

As Democrats, we are mindful that President Reagan recently won a resounding victory based on a soaring economy. To those who argue that the current lack of direction in trade policy should not be challenged because the President's election represents an endorsement of his position on trade, we would point to an earlier generation of victorious Republicans.

In 1929, Republican Congressman Willis Hawley, the author of the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act, observed:

"During the campaign of 1928, the Republican Party proposed to the country that a readjustment of the tariff would be effected, and special reference was made to a readjustment of the tariff as a part of the program of relief for agriculture. The country responded by the election of President Hoover with a tremendous vote and by a greatly increased Republican membership in this body. Construing the results of the election as an authorization and direction to this Congress to readjust the tariff duties, upon its assembling in December, 1928, it was decided to begin promptly this work."

The crash of 1929 had not yet come, much less the Depression induced by these "readjusted" Republican tariff rates, when Senator Cordell Hull fearlessly wrote in June 1929:

"American economic policy can no longer ignore the fact that since 1914 we have changed from a debtor and small surplus Nation to the greatest creditor and actual or potential, surplus-producing Nation in the world . . .

"When Republicans assert that tariff protection has become the accepted policy in this country, they do not mean reasonable, or adequate, or moderate protection, but inordinate, air-tight, superprotection intended to exclude every item of imports remotely competitive, which invites retaliation and which largely cuts us off from all markets for our surpluses. They dare not defend it upon grounds of revenue of equity or morals.

"This is the first economic issue tendered to Democrats. We must first halt and drive back the movement to fasten this unsound and destructive policy of extremism upon the country, by a demand that the Nation face in the opposite direction of lower tariffs, more liberal trade policies, and systematic efforts to develop an increasing export trade."

It was right to challenge superprotection in 1929, and we believe it is right to challenge disregard for trade in 1985.

If the trade barriers are going up, America must find a way to tear them down. They came down once before through hard-headed bargaining. It will take a hard-headed trade strategy to bring them down again.

As public servants who believe deeply in the workings of open markets, we have set out to find American policies affecting trade have gone wrong . . . and what can be done about it. We intend to understand how the world has changed in the last 15 years and to prescribe policies that Republicans as well as Democrats will support because they serve American interests today.

I. THE NEW GLOBAL ECONOMY

We are in an era of reduced U.S. influence, flexible exchange rates, interdependence, and mercantilist trade practices; a new global economy. Although the global economy has great potential to improve U.S. living standards, these changes are dangerous as well. Today they create windfall winners and losers among trading nations and generate protectionists pressures.

"Fact: The U.S. deficit on the current account—basically the difference between the goods and services this country sells to foreigners and those it buys from them—is an extraordinarily large $100 billion and climbing. In only two instances in the last 15 years, involving the United Kingdom in 1974 and Canada in 1975, have developed countries run current account deficits that were as large relative to their Gross National Product (GNP) as that of the United States in 1984." ("The Externalization of the U.S. Economy: Fact and Fiction," John D. Paulus, Chief Economist, Morgan Stanley Economics Department, Economic Perspectives, November 26, 1984.)

The United States faces a new Global Economy today. It is an economy that, in a very real sense, the world has never seen. Here are the four major changes:

Huge exchange flows

The change was born on March 11, 1973 with the breakup of the Bretton Woods system of regulated exchange rates. In place of Bretton Woods came a new flexible exchange rate market, a world market in currencies enormously different from what preceded it. Today, world currency flows may be as much as 25 times the size of world trade in goods, $50 trillion a year versus $2 trillion a year in trade.

This is a remarkable turn of events. Instead of competitive prowess or resources driving exchange rates, exchange rates determine whether the world's most efficient farmers and most productive manufacturers can find a buyer.

Now the price of goods is influenced by whatever currency speculators and investors look to; one day it may be the safety and security of the United States or Germany; the next, America's deepening budget deficit or Japan's burgeoning trade surplus; the third day, record U.S. real interest rates or sagging French exports. The tail now wags the dog.

Moreover, with the exchange rates driving trade flows, it is dawning on businessmen, farmers, and workers that they may never be able to become competitive. American firms cut costs by 50 percent in one year, and then find they must locate abroad. Workers settle for pay freezes and learn new technologies, only to find the exchange rate has made their product more expensive. A sense of distress derives not from the fact that the dramatic, daily change now placed upon competitors is beyond their control, but that it may be beyond any control at all.

Global interdependence

The second change has been the growing interdependence of world trade. The explosion in world trade since the 1960's that has meant a larger share of jobs and income than ever before is, in most nations, inextricably linked to foreign trade.

In combination with flexible exchange rates, this interdependence has added a striking degree of volatility to domestic economies. Foreign economic policies are no longer muted by inflexible exchange rates. Quite the opposite: they have been magnified by flexible rates. And domestic economic policies have become less potent because they tend to "leak" into the world economy, weakening their domestic effects almost immediately.

This volatility can be reduced if the United States exercises its strong leadership abilities to effect closer coordination of fiscal and monetary policies between the major trading countries.

New mercantilist trade practices

Notwithstanding the dangers of floating exchange rates and increasing interdependence, the possibilities for growth in a world economy are enormous. But it will take a truly open trading system to unlock this potential. That is where the potential is being lost.

Worldwide, government industrial stimulation to affect foreign trade—a new mercantilist trade policy—has increased. Export markets are highly prized for the income and employment they produce; imports are discouraged to protect infant industries and jobs, and to conserve scarce foreign exchange. Trade becomes a one-way street.

New mercantilist trade strategies of other countries depend on selling to the United States, the largest open, fully-integrated market in the world. U.S. trade policy treats such government involvement as benign, attacking such policies tangentially only when they openly constitute well recognized trade barriers and export subsidies.

The most effective practitioner of the new mercantilist trade practices is Japan. Japan has become the free world's second largest economy in good measure on the strength of its export sector. In 1984, its exports rose to nearly 80 percent of the level of U.S. exports, based on an economy only one-third as large. Yet, it imported fewer manufactured goods than the Netherlands, an amount scarcely equal to a bare 15 percent of U.S. manufactured imports.

Japan's tight-fisted access policies are deeply rooted in its government bureaucracy and highly nationalistic business practices. They are a source of great frustration to world class American exporters. According to the Department of Commerce, Japanese trade barriers cut U.S. exports to Japan by $12 billion last year. That cost the United States 400,000 jobs, including 27,000 in semiconductors alone.

The success of Japanese trade practices have encouraged the so-called newly industrializing countries (NIC's) along the Pacific Rim and in Latin America to emulate the market access policies of Japan. As a group, the NIC's are easily the fastest growing economies in the world.

These mercantilist trade practices, like their 18th Century predecessor, are inherently protectionist, designed to convert two-way trade to a one-way street. The success of such practices rests squarely on manipulation to generate a trade surplus. Thus, there is now a growing segment of the world market in goods in which governments compete, the twin of the world market in currency. No international agreement controls either of these markets.

Changing the role of the United States

The United States has industrial policies, especially in defense and agriculture, and some marginal subsidies that assist exports. But these programs are not supported by major schemes of protection, nor were they developed mainly to produce growth through exports.

The United States, in other words, is still the leader of an open, reciprocal trading system. But there has been a change in the role of the United States.

While it is clear that the United States is still powerful enough to affect the world's markets, by itself it cannot control currency markets, not can it simply order other governments to change their mercantilist trade practices. America must find new ways to use its power to convert the Global Economy into an engine of growth. The Global Economy holds out the hope that our grandchildren can inherit a life as much improved over ours as our lives are over those of our grandparents: But we have to make that happen.

THE TRADE DECLINE

The domestic economic policies of the current administration have ignored the existence of the global economy. The result: Huge trade deficits, unprecedented borrowing, and stalled world trade growth.

In Brasilia, Brazil, an American business aircraft sales team learns there is a 60 percent Brazilian duty and strict licensing of business aircraft imported into Brazil, and it gives up trying to sell there. In the United States, the same company completes against Brazilian aircraft exports, yet there is no U.S. duty on aircraft and no import licensing restrictions.

The record $123.3 billion merchandise trade deficit for 1984 hit America like a thunderbolt. An Administration living on borrowed money and ignoring the realities of the new world economy has responded by asserting these trade myths:

Myth one: The flood of foreign investment since 1981 has been attracted entirely by economic strength, not interest rates. That is incorrect. Over one-third of the dollar's appreciation occurred during the recession because real interest rates were rising sharply even as the economy plunged into its most severe post-war downturn.

Myth two: The bloated dollar is not harming the U.S. economy. In reality, it is responsible for two-thirds of the trade balance deterioration since 1980 or nearly one-half of the current trade deficit, and for the sharp fall in American competitiveness in world markets. Moreover, while the price of a barrel of oil has declined from $35 to under $30 in the United States, the high price of the dollar has raised the price of a barrel in Europe to the equivalent of $48, helping to stall growth there.

Myth three: The trade deficit is a temporary, healthy development. In the current trade environment, U.S. industries are moving offshore or being encouraged to buy more of their components offshore. Reestablishing these productive facilities, even if favorable trade conditions can be restored, will be prohibitively expensive. Current passive trade policies, if continued, will further discourage the return of these facilities, by tolerating foreign mercantilist trade practices and leaving the U.S. market relatively wide open. The trade deficits are likely to worsen, not improve, this year.

Myth four: The lagging Japanese and European economic recoveries are the cause of the trade deficit. Lagging growth abroad has had an impact on U.S. trade, but it is not the major factor. Weak Administration efforts to achieve greater market access have limited U.S. exports to Japan. The European recovery is lagging, in part due to high U.S. interest rates, but is responsible for no more than one-quarter of the trade deficit deterioration.

Myth five: The Administration has not resorted to protectionism. The Administration has imposed more trade barriers than any President since Herbert Hoover. Its budget and trade policies are largely responsible for the trade deficit. Yet, protectionism by default has become the Administration's major policy response to the trade deficit.

America: An international debtor

This year for the first time since 1914, the United States has become an international debtor. Each night, the Administration drinks up more foreign capital to bridge the next day's gap between imports and exports. "Vampire economics," Harald Malmgren, the former Deputy U.S. Trade Representative (USTR), calls it.

As in all Administration deficit matters, this will not be done in moderation. Borrowing fully 19 cents of every dollar it has proposed to spend, the Administration has pushed real interest rates up, and the dollar is at dangerous, record levels. By the end of 1986, the United States could well have more foreign creditors than Mexico and Brazil together. Like all nations who live beyond their means, servicing that debt will impose a lifetime burden on each man, woman, and child. Americans face reduced future standards of living, less growth, and higher rates of interest in order to transfer real resources abroad to satisfy these obligations.

If America waits five years to attack its external debt, it may need an export surplus of as much as 2.5 percent of GNP to stop the debt compounding. The current account deficit is now about 2.6 percent of GNP. To obtain such a turnaround in five short years will require a monumental shakeup in the U.S. economy. The Chief Economist for Kemper Financial Services, Mr. David Hale, wrote recently in the Wall Street Journal, "The problem is that the longer this trend persists, the greater will be the economy's adjustment problems when the U.S. ceases to be an automatic recycling center for the world's surplus savings."

Unemployment

The trade deficit has inhibited growth sufficiently to leave unemployment stalled higher than any recovery in history. It is hovering far above the low point of 5.7 percent attained in the previous extended recovery from the 1974 recession. Indeed, while growth has been good in three of the preceding four years, unemployment from 1981 through 1984 has averaged 8.6 percent—nearly 40 percent above the 6.2 percent average unemployment rate during the 1970's. Virtually all of that shortfall rests squarely with the more than 2 million jobs lost in recent years by our eroding foreign trade sector.

Entrance of the current so-called baby generation to the labor force has greatly eased the need to generate employment opportunities since 1980. The labor force is growing a scant 1.6 percent annually this decade compared to the robust 2.6 percent annual growth which occurred in the 1970's. Had that previous pace been sustained, unemployment would be hovering over 10 percent today under current policies. Not since the 1950's has the U.S. labor force been expanding so slowly. Even so, unemployment has stalled above 7 percent for nearly a year, due to the trade imbalance.

Eroding American competitiveness

The immediate impact of the dollar crisis in farming and manufacturing is obscuring its longer term impact. Administration foreign economic policies are eroding the American competitive base, jeopardizing the nation's ability to remain a first-rate international economic power and to provide future employment growth. Since 1980, American industry after industry has lost its foreign trade edge. Semiconductors, shipbuilding, telecommunications, textiles—the list is long and growing. It includes high technology as well as basic industries.

The stalled engine of growth

In the post-war period until 1980, trade was an engine of world growth. Between 1965 and 1980, world exports expanded from $189 billion to a peak of $2.043 trillion, an increase of over ten-fold in 15 years. Even exports from developing nations were impressive, soaring nearly 7 percent a year since 1965. They have propelled developing nations like Korea, Taiwan, Singapore, Mexico, and Brazil into modern industrial economies.

But world export growth ceased between 1980 and 1983. It did not just fall back to a position in step with world growth of production; the value of world exports actually fell. This is the single greatest trade contraction since the 1930's.

In 1984, when final data are in, world exports may again have increased, but if so, this will be primarily because of American imports, a development that is simply not sustainable. Trade is no longer a locomotive of growth; it has become a brake on growth.

A lack of balance

The world trade decline has occurred in spite of stupendous American trade deficits and large national surpluses elsewhere. This is because major trading countries have not followed internationally responsible economic policies, as measured by the large deficits of the United States and the large surpluses of others in their "basic" balance of payments—merchandise trade, services, return on investment and capital flows taken together.

Collectively, large imbalances have created a global problem. Trade barrriers to protect infant industries in Japan constitute a bilateral issue. But when they and other causes of imbalance spread to the five leading NIC's and beyond, the problem becomes worldwide, and the result is the slowdown in the growth of trade. The huge trade and current account deficits in the United States and the huge surpluses in these measures in Japan are important contributors to the current lack of balance.

Some of these imbalances are said to be necessary to resolve the debt crisis in the developing world. In many heavily indebted countries, unreasonable and unjustifiable import restrictions and determined export-promotion drives are combined with other austerity policies to pay off the debts of these countries. Such a combination produces slow growth in their domestic markets and large international trade surpluses. The import barriers and export subsidies tend to become entrenched.

And since the United States now imports nearly 60 percent of non-OPEC developing country exports, and Japan only 8 percent, the burden of debt crisis protectionism, austerity and export promotion in the developing world is borne by the U.S. trade deficit.

There is another way. Growth in world trade requires more responsible, cooperative and growth-oriented solutions to the debt crisis, such as more cooperation in opening industrialized markets, and faster growth in world trade. An examination of the causes and of cooperative approaches to the debt problem is needed. These are the responsible solutions to the debt crisis, not the current go-it-alone policy of the Administration.

As a global power, the United States must be concerned about trade slowdowns. As an individual trader, the United States should be alarmed as well, for our open markets have borne the brunt of these one-way policies.

The possibilities

The new world economy presents enormous possibilities. Reaping the trade and growth benefits of this new and highly interdependent world economy is in the interest of the United States. Foreign government trade strategies that cause wrenching adjustments in this country and wide fluctuations in trade patterns will not disappear because the U.S. Government announces it is for "free trade." Some control over the excesses in the world marketplace are essential. The challenge is to develop a trade policy, as well as economic policies, that promote stability and free trade.

III—ERODING INTERNATIONAL RULES

International trade rules are as necessary to free trade as rules of the road to free travel. But the existing rules do not reckon with the global economy. Yet international trade rules, such as the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT), have to be strengthened if possible, not abandoned.

"In a recent survey of 49 countries, 27 were found to maintain local content requirements for automobiles. In Mexico, for example, 70 percent of the value of cars and 80 percent of trucks must be of local origin. Australia requires 85 percent. Most of Western Europe and Japan do not maintain local content requirements." ("Issues in U.S. Trade Policy," Congressional Research Service, April 23, 1982, Report No. 82-77E.)

Trade rules are very much like rules of the road: "In international trade, just as in road traffic, following accepted rules actually enhances everyone's freedom of action," according to the report of seven eminent persons appointed by the Secretary General of the GATT in 1984 to study and report on problems facing the international trading system.

An absence of rules

International trade rules, such as they are, do not cover many areas of world commerce, including some of the most important:

The estimated $30 to $50 trillion in annual world currency flows are subject to no significant international agreements.

Trade in petroleum, the most valuable commodity trade in the world, is driven by the rules of an international cartel that does not consult the hundreds of millions of people adversely affected by those rules. The cartel can hardly be called "international law."

Trade in services is not for the most part covered by international rules.

Barter and trade by corporations owned by governments are not subject to significant GATT control.

As much as 90 percent of the trade protection in the world was not carried out in accordance with GATT rules.

International agreements on the protection of intellectual property exclude many nations and generally fail to provide effective protection, even though technological advantage—an essential component of competitiveness—can be easily lost in the world economy without effective agreements.

It is no surprise that the GATT advisers concluded earlier this year:

"From the beginning, the GATT rules were flexible and pragmatic. But in recent years some countries have abused the system's built-in flexibility to avoid complying with the spirit of its basic rules. Others have sought trade advantage by taking measures not adequately dealt with in normal negotiations or covered by the rules of GATT."

In a special meeting with this Democratic Working Group, the Chairman of the Trade Committee of the President's Commission on Industrial Competitiveness reported that whereas GATT covered 20 percent of world trade in 1950, it covers less than 5 percent today.

Failure to take account of the New World Economy

The GATT assumes a world that no longer exists, of fixed exchange rates and countries that do not protect infant industries; a world where customs duties make a significant difference. That world is gone forever.

First, there is a whole new set of players. A system that only 20 years ago consisted mainly of the industrialized West and Japan now includes the newly industrialized countries, Korea, Singapore, Taiwan, Brazil, Mexico, and others. These countries now export twice as much to the United States as a percentage of trade as they did in 1960. By 1995, they will be engaged in twice the trade with the United States as the United States is now with Europe, according to estimates done for the President's Commission on Industrial Competitiveness. To a large extent, GATT rules do not apply to those countries, under the special provisions of Part IV of the GATT, "Trade and Development."

Moreover, where tariffs were once the trade barrier, now countries use anything but a tariff as their main trade barrier. Called "nontariff barriers" or "NTB's," there is no limit to the variety of these NTB's excempt the human imagination. NTB's are extremely difficult to control, because they can take almost any form, from requiring needlessly detailed customs inspections to unattainable health standards. Notwithstanding efforts to control NTB's in the Tokyo Round of Trade Negotiations (1973 through 1979), NTB's are growing faster now than anytime in the last 10 years.

In addition, world trade is affected by dozens of agreements other than the GATT intended to manage explosions of exports. The most pervasive form of trade management agreement—the bilateral "voluntary" restraint agreement (VRA)—is now a commonplace. Indeed, notwithstanding its free trade rhetoric, the Administration has itself negotiated a worldwide network of VRA's that will be the opposite of "free trade" in U.S. steel trade for the next five years. Since non-GATT VRA's actually guide practice much more than the basic rules of GATT do, the United States is now in an environment where the international law to trade tends more toward trade management than allowing it to run "free."

Finally, in place of the GATT free trade model now stands the model of import restraints and export promotion, the new mercantilist trade practices. To many countries, the GATT is simply a gauntlet of technicalities, easily breached because even its greatest defender, the United States, often devises ways around the rules.

Even so, keep the GATT

Yet GATT is not dead, nor is it irrelevant; it is a marketplace of ideas, not a set of rules. It is an influence rather than a policeman. Even this limited capability can be useful to the United States.

For example, in some cases, GATT provides a forum in which some limited consensus can be generated:

In a recent case, a panel of experts advised the GATT that Spanish taxes on soy oil did not deny the United States the benefits of tariff concessions on soybeans, one of the most important U.S. agricultural exports. However, in the GATT, the United States at least convinced other members not to adopt this decision.

In another case, when the United States complained that Canadian investment regulations were undermining the benefit of prior Candian tariff concessions to the United States, GATT actually agreed, and Canada was forced to change the regulations to the satisfaction of the U.S. Administration.

Of course, this process has great limitations. With varying levels of obligation among members, and numerous exceptions to exceptions, GATT represents more a continuing negotiation on trade rules than a constitution for trade. Breaking down trade barriers through the GATT process of discussion, or any other negotiating process, suffers from a lag. Typically, as a barrier is understood, complained about, and eventually reduced, new barriers replace it. The same is true of export promotion schemes.

More fundamental than the institution, however, is the one basic understanding that many believe lies behind GATT: That growing trade means improving living standards so long as the growth is stable. Stability is tested by the ability of trading nations to cooperate by avoiding major international economic imbalances. This simple idea is as true in the new Global Economy as it was at the end of the Second World War.

Therefore, a legitimate objective of U.S. policy is a stronger, more comprehensive GATT. But we must not be misled into assuming that the only solutions are multilateral. Multilateral consensus on the old forms of trade was built on a basis of bilateral trade agreements. Multilateral consensus on the new Global Economy must be built on the same basis.

IV—THE LOSS OF TRADE LEADERSHIP

American trade laws can be made to respond to the global economy with relatively little change. Moreover, we know from experience that tough trade strategies can open up trade. The missing element is trade leadership.

In Washington, D.C., the Administration pushes Congress to reduce U.S. import duties on gasoline imported from the People's Republic of China, even though the Chinese gasoline does not meet U.S. octane standards, U.S. refineries oppose the idea, and the Chinese offer no concession in return. Meanwhile, 12,000 miles away, the Japanese Government prevents a Japanese petroleum trading company from importing a single shipload of gasoline into Japan from Singapore, where gasoline is refined more cheaply than in Japan, to protect Japanese refineries from a 10-cent per gallon drop in the price of gasoline.

U.S. trade law was not intended to deal with the Global Economy. This body of law is a hodge-podge descended from turn-of-the-century unfair trade practice statutes; the Reciprocal Trade Agreements program of the 1930's; and the laws of the 1950's, 1960's, and the 1970's designed primarily to implement the GATT and protect U.S. rights under the GATT.

Yet the laws are broad enough to deal with most aspects of the current condition. What little authority might be required is not lacking because of Congressional resistance but because no recent President has pointed out that there is a problem, much less proposed a way to deal with the problem.

Similarly, current American trade policy takes little account of the Global Ecomony. What was, in the 1930's, a hardheaded strategy of bargaining for reductions in trade barriers, has gradually become a policy of leading by example—a kind of unilateral disarmament in trade. Few follow the example. After all, running $150 billion trade deficits, damaging domestic industries, and overvaluing currency is hardly inspiring to others.

The danger of protectionsim

There are many ways to hide from a $123 billion trade deficit. The worst is protectionism. Yet the danger of protectionism is greatest now, with surging trade deficits.

The first source of danger is political. In the new world economy, there is much that destroys support for international trade. Rapidly fluctuating exchange rates make adjustment difficult. Surging imports tear down linkages in the economy, putting workers in the competing domestic company out of work first and then displacing workers who supplied the industry with materials, services and technology. Finally, exporting industries, deprived of foreign markets by forces beyond their control, lose their interest in trade, and revoke their support of the open trading system.

The second source of danger is economic. As foreign debt mounts, and investment in industry declines, it becomes necessary to protect domestic industry, so it can rebuild and develop export industries that can, eventually, pay off the debt. This is the argument of Brazil and Mexico for protection today. Will it be America's tomorrow?

These are potent forces, and it will take potent strategies to channel them in positive directions over the next few years. But it is clearly in the national interest to do so.

In combating protectionism, we believe that import barriers and protectionism are not necessarily the same thing. Import barriers are recognized by international trade rules, and can serve legitimate purposes of promoting competitiveness, dampening especially harsh effects of economic change, and leveraging other governments into opening their markets. The danger in the current situation is "superprotection," airtight protection of industries without requiring they become competitive. What we fear is that the current lack of coherent trade policy will leave the Administration with no alternative except superprotection.

Infirmities of current law

Current U.S. trade law provides a variety of import and export remedies and programs, but these have been outdated by the realities of the new Global Economy. Two examples:

Unfair trade practice laws.—Since most international unfair trade practice law merely offsets that part of the price of the import shown to be unfair, such laws do not offset the 40 percent subsidy given to imports in the last few years by the overvalued dollar.

Thus, while the huge deficits are driving companies to unfair trade relief laws in unprecedented numbers, frustration with the operation of the laws is reflected in a lengthening list of reforms put before each convening Congress.

Escape clause.—U.S. law also provides that when an entire industry is threatened with serious injury by increasing imports, then the government may provide relief even though there is nothing unfair about the imports. This is the "escape clause." In effect, escape clause relief is to provide time to adjust to the competition. Most such petitions have been regularly denied. In some cases, politically powerful industries, such as automobiles and steel, have managed to obtain relief, unfortunately outside the regular channels of U.S. law and international agreements. But they are the exceptions. Since 1975, 54 petitions for so-called escape clause relief have been filed; some form of relief—almost always less than enough to completely remove the harmful impact—was provided in only 13.

Part of the problem is that the escape clause law is written in such a way as to severely limit eligibility. For example, current eligibility requirements resulted in a decision in 1980 that imports were not a substantial cause of serious harm to the domestic automobile industry. Yet four months later, the Reagan Administration found it necessary to strong-arm the Japanese Government into limiting automobile exports to the United States for four years.

But more often the problem is that Presidents deny relief unless there is overwhelming political pressure for it. Few industries can muster such pressure. In the scramble for such clout, industrial adjustment—the purpose of the law—is usually given short shrift.

A lack of program

In several areas, the United States lacks significant programs that have become virtual necessities in the current world trading system. For example:

Export programs.—The United States hardly has an export policy worthy of the name, let alone export subsidies. There is no effort to coordinate the export market tools that exist. There is an export tax exemption—enacted first at the instance of the Nixon Administration in 1973 and revised at the instance of the Reagan Administration in 1984—but it hardly offsets the disadvantages placed upon U.S. exporters by border tax rebates and adjustments of other countries. There is a modest export financing scheme for capital goods, the Export-Import Bank (Eximbank), which is not sufficient to compete with foreign subsidies of the same nature (and which the Administration wants to reduce further). And there is an agricultural export subsidy program used when the agricultural export subsidies of other countries—particularly the European Common Market (the European Communities, or EC)—so interfere with traditional U.S. agricultural export markets that some retaliation is plainly necessary.

What the United States does have is barriers to exports.

The main barrier today is the 40 percent "tax" on exports represented by the overvalued dollar. But there are others.

The export incentives pale by comparison with a system of direct export controls for national security, foreign policy or short supply. Through at least two Administrations, these laws have become increasingly arbitrary; application times have become prohibitive; and the effect abroad has as often as not been the opposite of that intended. Food embargoes have damaged U.S. markets abroad more than they have helped the stated policy objectives of the embargo. President Reagan's embargo of pipeline equipment to the Soviet Union in 1982 did not prevent the Soviets from building the Yamal pipeline; it did deepen rifts in the delicate and strategically important Atlantic alliance.

The pipeline embargo also hurt U.S. exports by making American producers appear to be unreliable suppliers. For example, major European firms, such as Creusot-Loire, which had purchased American products for a century, found it necessary under the circumstances to undertake an assessment to determine their reliance on American products. Not surprisingly, they found their reliance was too great.

Displaced worker programs.—The United States currently has no significant displaced worker program. The Trade Adjustment Assistance program, which included payments to workers laid off by reason of trade pressures, as well as training, job search and relocation allowances for workers and small loans and technical assistance to firms, is scheduled for final burial in the Administration's fiscal year 1986 budget. The Job Training Partnership Act that is supposed to do the job does not have the funding to undertake the tremendous task of job adjustment now taking place in America. The U.S. Employment Service, through inadequate funding and lack of Administration commitment to it, has been set up to fail, regardless of the agency's intentions.

It is now estimated there may be as many as one million U.S. displaced workers per year in America. These are workers with a demonstrated attachment to work. They have the proven capacity to learn the new jobs that will keep America competitive. Many of them have already taken tremendous pay cuts in import-sensitive industries. We believe it is fundamentally unfair to give these workers no way out except unemployment as the price for the benefits of free trade. The nation will benefit from efforts to develop effective, cost-conscious programs of training, job search, and job relocation for them.

Industrial adjustment conditions.—We must find ways to promote favorable, positive industrial adjustments in this country. To compete, the United States must insist upon industrial changes that promote international competitiveness. But the escape clause is often not used as an adjustment program. Consumers and workers should be assured that relief under the escape clause will lead to industrial progress, such as modernization. In the recent Administration program placing quotas on basic steel imports, there were no such conditions. But Democrats insisted on a quid pro quo from industry, and got it, in the Omnibus Trade and Tariff Act of 1984.

Japan has such programs for industries in decline. The programs provide both protection and a phaseout of uneconomic facilities. Indeed, these programs frequently represent barriers to U.S. exports. America needs to make better use of the escape clause.

The information gap.—One aspect of the trade barrier-identification problem is the surprising lack of trade information within the U.S. Government. There is no law to regularly provide the Government with the information it needs to formulate active trade policies. The General Accounting Office (GAO) reported last year that laws to help provide such information are not being enforced.

Trade information is an area ideal for assistance by computers, but the process of introducing and adapting data processing technology to trade policy analysis is slow and piecemeal. The United States now has what is probably the best trade data in the world, but it has limited staff resources to analyze or even process the data.

Finally, we see a need to link trade data and production data. Trade data are available on a more timely basis than production data, but the current situation results from inattention, not technical barriers. Input/output information—the kind of data Japan relies on to do its strategic trade planning—was not yet available in this country in the fall of 1984 for any year later than 1977.

Other programs.—The United States lacks many other programs to help cope with the new economy, many of which other countries now have. But we must be cautious. Many of these programs will not adapt well to America, or would tend more to undermine than build up trade. For example, U.S. law does not provide a remedy such as the one available in most of the trading world for "infant industries": Protection from imports in the early phases of a business. But we believe such programs should be thoroughly considered before they are suggested. At this time, notwithstanding the obvious unfairness of other countries having such programs, we believe the right approach is to try to break down the trade barriers such programs present, rather than to imitate them.

The current trade policy vacuum

Current Administration actions affecting trade are limited to initiating only narrowly targeted trade programs. The trade actions of the Administration show it has no uniform strategy for dealing with the current problem.

Responding to petitions.—There is a great deal of American trade law; unlike many other countries, we do the government of trade in the sunshine. Most of these laws can be used affirmatively by the President, but they also permit private persons to petition for government assistance or relief. In most cases, the President has been waiting for petitions, avoiding trade problems on an ad hoc basis. But the growth of the mercantilist trade practices requires a more affirmative response than waiting for petitions. This is not only because in most cases American companies fear foreign government retaliation if they complain about barriers, but because the United States must assert leadership. The alternative is to have American trade policy made by majority vote of the GATT.

Caribbean Basin and Israel.—The Administration's trade initiatives, such as they have been, widely accepted by Members of both political parties. The Caribbean Basin Initiative and the free trade area agreement with Israel were (or shortly will be) approved by Congress with the active cooperation of many Democrats. But these programs are hardly responses adequate to the enormous problems presented by the new Global Economy. There, the Administration has fallen short.

The "new round."—The Administration has called for a new round of trade talks for the past three years, but it has done little if anything to actually make it happen. Often its actions have appeared to conflict with its works. For example, it astonished fellow trading partners when, barely a month after an economic summit pledge to resist protectionism, it gave escape clause relief to the domestic specialty steel industry.

Moreover, a new trade round is not, in itself, an answer to the current situation. For example, the Administration's list of objectives for the new round is the same list that almost turned to tragedy at the 1982 GATT meeting of Trade Ministers—a list that virtually ignores current issues of the international economy. We do not argue with what is on this list, as far as it goes—trade in services, trade-related investment, agriculture, improvements in escape clause provisions. We argue with what is not on the list.

Where is a discussion of efforts to control current fluctuations of currency prices, the international trade development that most hurst American farmers? Where is a discussion of efforts at promoting adjustment, controlling export credits, protecting U.S. intellectual property, and pushing back the effects of the new mercantilism?

In some cases, other countries have demanded international discussion of these issues. It required an active refusal by the Administration to avoid discussing these issues. At this time, the Administration position still seems to be to avoid putting such issues on the GATT agenda. Therefore, the agenda for the "new round" is not complete.

Finally, the Administration has not taken adequate steps to build a national, domestic consensus on what America wants from a new round—and what it is willing to pay. It has sought no legislative authority for the new round.

Japan.—At the beginning of 1985, apparently realizing the trade deficit was at least a political problem, the Administration identified four narrow sectors in which Japan has the most obvious and egregious kinds of protectionism. The Administration tactic was basically to embarass Japan into reducing these barriers, first by releasing Japan from any obligation to limit the number of automobiles exported to the United States and then by publicly criticizing the Japanese for refusing to open wide these sectors.

Aside from the fact this strategy did not work—at least by the first of what will probably be many "deadlines" for Japanese market-opening—the action was much narrower than the current economic situation calls for.

Japan tends to set the standard of new mercantilism, but it is not the only example. Our largest bilateral trade deficit may be with Japan, but it is not our only large bilateral trade deficit. A global trade strategy is called for, not piecemeal tactics.

Trade strategy that works

In fact, the Administration has failed to present to the American people a strategy for saving the open world trading system. In order to revive the open world trading system, the American Government will have to understand the Global Economy. Only then can it see the need to act affirmatively.

The old strategy.—The old tactic was effective in its time: Reciprocal agreements to reduce tariffs, the "Reciprocal Trade Agreements" program. This strategy has recently run up on two rocks.

First, there is an increasing number of free riders, especially in the tariff-cutting system. For example, when the United States "deregulated" its telecommunications industry, other countries got greatly increased access to the huge U.S. market, while the United States got nothing in return. When countries can get trade benefits from the United States free, why should they "pay" for them?

Second, U.S. tariffs are now so low, they provide little bargaining leverage; and the United States has relatively few of the NTB's that are the heart of mercantilist trade practices. Moreover, NTB concessions are often worthless, since barriers negotiated away are often replaced by equally effective NTB's not covered by the agreement. For example, if Japan agrees not to employ inspection on the dock— a form of nontariff trade barrier—but later institutes a requirement for design certification of imports, they have merely traded on NTB for another.

New tactics.—As a result, in the Trade Act of 1974, Congress set forth new general and specific trade negotiating objectives, and new system to accomplish these objectives, tactics that were to be used in combination with the old tactic of reciprocal trade agreements. Some of the new Congressionally-authorized tactics included:

Bilateral trade agreements (instead of multilateral agreements) (section 105);

Limiting membership in new agreements to only those countries that accept the obligations of the agreement (no "free riders") (section 102(f)).

Sector-by-sector negotiations (section 104);

Authority to cut U.S. rates of duty (section 101);

Some of the tactics Congress provided were utilized. For example, when the Carter Administration was unable to get general agreement on various "Codes" to control NTB's and subsidies, it entered into the Codes with those countries that were willing to accept higher levels of discipline, using the Congressional "no free riders" tactic. This tactic allegedly breached the cherished unconditional most-favored-nation doctrine. But without it, there probably would have been no Subsidies Code. Thus, although the results were limited, the Tokyo Round showed that the constuctive use of new, tough trade tactics could result in trade liberalization, even though this might upset to some degree certain GATT doctrines.

Now, even tougher tactics are necessary because the obstacles to open trade are greater. Instead of merely denying greater access to the U.S. market, we will have to be prepared to reduce access to the U.S. market for a proper purpose. We know this will work. In 1981, the Multifiber Arrangement (MFA) was renewed in part because under U.S. law, had the MFA not been renewed, duties would have snapped back to their 1975 levels.

As the leader of the world trading system, the United States must attempt to use tactics that ultimately expand total trade or at least defend a specific, palpable U.S. strategic interest. Random import restraints imposed for no more reason that political expediency—such as the Administration decision to raise duties on heavy motorcycles—hurt America's ability to make progess in the new world market. Countries that find import barriers hard to resist were given an argument to hide behind.

The trade strategy law

One major statute lends itself to a trade strategy for controlling the excesses of foreign government trade strategies. This is section 301 of the Trade Act of 1974, which essentially authorizes the President to restrict imports or take any other action within his power to retaliate for foreign actions that deny U.S. exports "fair" and equitable market opportunities." The statute was amended in 1984 to add the "market opportunities" language, and to require annual estimates of U.S. trade opportunities, and the barriers to them.

In its pre-1984 form, section 301 was used mostly at the request of U.S. exporters, much in the manner of a foreign claims settlement provision. It led mostly to negotiations, not retaliation. But used affirmatively by the President, such actions can lead to consultations that open markets. For example, the President has initiated a GATT case on his own motion which reached the successful conclusion of forcing Canada to change its investment laws, thus promoting U.S. exports. (The Canadian law in effect required U.S. persons who invested in Canada to buy their supplies from Canadians.) Despite many other barriers to U.S. exports worldwide, the tactic has not been employed consistently.

There have also been isolated incidents of action to promote U.S. exports in the face of foreign unfair competition—for example, a subsidized sale of wheat flour to Egypt in 1982 to knock out the sale of French wheat flour subsidized by the EC. But such actions have so far been too few and isolated to work a change in EC policies—although such tactics can be effective if they are part of a larger strategy.

Therefore, we know section 301 and similar actions have the potential to serve as tools for creating effective but temperate American trade strategies. They have not been used to do the job so far.

U.S. trade organization

The President has it within his power to make trade a priority. It is important he have the organization, as well as the power to do the job.

The U.S. domestic organization to deal with trade, often criticized by those within government as well as without, is a creature of law as well. It consists of three distinct parts: The interagency process to be presided over by the U.S. Trade Representative (USTR), a Cabinet officer who sits in the White House; the advisory process, a network of industrial, agricultural, intergovernmental, and labor private sector technical experts, to keep the process serving American interests; and the Congress, whose trade committee members have statutory status as members of U.S. trade delegations, as well as being consultants on trade agreements and arbiters of the laws that make or break American trade policy.

This is a system intended to be responsive to direction from the top. There is a vacuum of such direction now; there is no consistent U.S. trade policy. Ad hoc committees can only prepare options. If the President waits for consensus to decide the issues, America will never use the tactics in its arsenal.

No reorganizational suggestions can fill the void left by the current lack of leadership on trade. The Congressional mandate on trade has always been clear: There should be one trade voice, who reports to the President.

The Administration has compounded the problems of American trade policymaking. In 1981, it created a nonstatutory trade advisory group—the Cabinet Council on Commerce and Trade—chaired by the President, with the Secretary of Commerce as Chairman Pro Tempore. Then, in 1982, the Administration formed the Senior Interdepartmental Group on International Economic Policy. The Secretary of Defense, the Secretary of Interior, and the National Security Adviser sat on the statutory Trade Policy Committee but not on the Council on Commerce and Trade. The Secretary of Energy and the Attorney General sat on both—but were not on the Senior Interdepartmental Group. The Vice President sat on the Cabinet Council on Commerce and Trade, but when the President was absent, the Secretary of Commerce sat as Chairman. No wonder there is confusion in American trade policy.

Recently, the Administration abolished the Cabinet Council on Commerce and Trade and folded these functions into a new, larger Cabinet Council, chaired by the Secretary of the Treasury. This latest reorganization may or it may not reduce the confusion, but it certainly gives trade even less priority than it has now, and it does not, moreover, assure any greater Presidential attention to this vital area of concern.

V—RECOMMENDATIONS

The United States must formulate a consistent trade strategy. It would champion an open reciprocal trading system, getting its own house in order, reducing exchange rate volatility, promoting international economic coordination, and utilizing international law and domestic law strategically.

Principles and specific trade recommendations

The United States is a robust, competitive, productive, and innovative nation, and the leader of the free world. It is in this nation's self-interest—and it is its responsibility—to promote a system of free and open trade.

We are failing in efforts to achieve this goal. A new mercantilism of trade manipulation, inherently protectionist, is spreading throughout the world.

The United States remains the champion of an open trading system, but many nations no longer follow our lead. We are in an era of eroding international rules of trade, a time of economic difficulty nearing the crisis stage.

The United States is the largest exporting and importing nation in history—and we are burdened by the largest international trade deficit in history. Our response is critical, but there is no clear indication of when or how we will use our enormous economic authority. Used carelessly to confront a crisis, we could lead the world to economic ruin. Used wisely and carefully, it can lead back to the path of prosperous open trade.

Trade must become a priority concern of this Government. We believe the following principles and recommendations will build a solid base for a wise, new beginning in the trade history of the world.

Many of the tools needed in this endeavor are already authorized by law. Our failures in the field of trade are due primarily to simple neglect by the current Administration, as well as the lack of policy of previous Administrations. Thus, the most needed change in American trade policy is a change in attitude, not law.

Principles of a new U.S. trade policy

Recognize the existence of a new Global Economy.—Characteristics of today's Global Economy are reduced U.S. influence, huge capital flows, trade-distorting mercantilist trade practices, and a growing economic interdependence among nations. Recent Administrations have largely failed to recognize the existence or the implications of this new economy. The goal of free trade remains valid, but the strategy for reaching it must change under these new conditions.

Avoid wide imbalances.—We must revive the basic consensus which produced growth after World War II—the avoidance of wide imbalances in such basic measures as merchandise trade and external debt. Whenever and wherever they occur, these deficits and surpluses of trader nations must be brought within reasonable limits and kept there.

A trade strategy, not a trade mythology.—The United States must use its enormous leverage—including both incentives and penalties—to move other nations toward an open trade system. American trade policy has proceeded as if the nations of the world follow and open their markets behind us. In reality, Japan has become the worldwide model.

Trade must expand faster than the GNP.—The trade policy of this nation must be directed toward expansion of the total trade of the world, now about $2 trillion, to the point that trade produces growth for the United States and the rest of the world.

Correct our domestic economic problems.—Existing trade problems are compounded by domestic problems of low savings, huge Federal budget deficits, relatively tight money and our status as an international debtor. These are roadblocks to international cooperation and successful trade, and they must be corrected.

TRADE POLICY RECOMMENDATIONS

International measures

(1) The Administration should prepare a catalog of trade-related benefits and penalties that are available for use as leverage in rebuilding the world trading system. It should identify powers already delegated to the President, and he should use those powers to improve the domestic economy and world trade.

(2) The President should exercise his existing authority to enter into bilateral trade agreements. While the ultimate goal of the United States should be tough, worldwide trade agreements, bilateral agreements are valuable tools in building a consensus or improved international rules. The President should proceed to consult with statutory private sector advisers, Congress, and others on possible bilateral agreements. Such discussions should move forward while homework on a "new round" of multi-county trade discussions is completed.

(3) The United States should determine where it (as well as other countries) could expand exports under the "most-favored-nation" principle of trade concessions, but are not doing so because of unreasonable and unjustifiable foreign trade barriers. This nation should then formulate strategies that offer special credit for increasing imports of U.S. products and carefully targeted trade retaliation against these barriers.

(4) We believe the United States should not proceed with a new round of trade negotiations at this time because certain basic preliminary steps have not been taken. Steps that should precede such negotiations include the following:

First, major international trade influences, such as the international currency market, should be on the agenda of the new round. The agenda should also include methods of controlling the effects of the new trading practices of many countries. Options for preventing domestic problems that affect trade should be considered, as well as techniques to insure coordination of economic policies. The Administration should encourage discussions for overhauling the international financial system.

Second, a special Presidential Commission on U.S. trade Policy should be established and consulted. This Commission should consist of representatives of both major political parties, including Members of Congress, and of interested private persons, including consumers. The Commission should be charged with identifying the trade objectives of the nation. The statutory Trade Policy Advisory System should be fully consulted on the new round.

Third, upon consideration of recommendations of the Commission and the Trade Policy Advisory System, the President should submit legislation setting forth the objectives of the United States in the new round and act pursuant to the authority Congress gives him.

Domestic law and policy changes

(1) The escape clause law should be used to promote increased U.S. competitiveness. Current law provides that when an entire industry is threatened with serious injury, or is actually injured, by increasing imports, the government may provide import relief under this law. It should be as easy as international trade rules permit for a domestic industry to qualify for trade relief. Then, relief should be provided on the condition of strict programs of new industrial investment by the industry assisted. Emphasis should be on maintaining the economic health of industries important to the national economic welfare.

(2) A comprehensive program is needed to support displaced workers—those persons with a history of attachment to the workplace and whose employers certify them as permanently unemployed. Up to one million such workers per year left jobless deserve a better alternative than an unemployment check or assistance by the underfunded Jobs Training Partnership Act. They are jobless because of structural problems beyond their control.

(3) The present layering on non-statutory trade panels within the Executive branch should be removed. Congress should consider legislation strengthening the authority of the USTR—giving him the authority to take certain trade actions. Just as other major White House advisers have jurisdiction over their areas of concern, the USTR should manage trade in cooperation with the President. Congress should also consider a small White House coordinating staff on trade.

Technically qualified advisers from industries and labor and agricultural groups concerned with trade should be appointed to the Trade Policy Advisory System. The System was designed as a panel to assist the Administration on trade matters, and it should be used in this important effort.

(4) The United States should coordinate export incentives as needed to achieve a national export policy. Export incentives include expanded Eximbank financing and carefully targeted agricultural export subsidies. U.S. policy should attempt to assure, if not actually obtain, export opportunities for U.S. exporters. The government should consider the effects on the economy before interrupting exports for any reason. Efforts should be made to authorize the Eximbank at levels sufficient to offset subsidy programs of foreign governments.

A study should be instituted to examine whether and how to establish a market in export-credit documents. In exchange for buying our goods, we sometimes offer to buy-down interest rates on loans to other nations. We should determine whether there is a market for this international indebtedness—as there is a market for similar domestic transactions. It may thereby be possible to give the U.S. taxpayer more bang for his buck by leveraging larger transactions.

(5) Undisputed facts on international trade would be valuable in planning our trade strategies, but such reliable information is not now available in a usable form or timely fashion. The government should initiate a program to collect information on American and foreign production and trade, maintained under conditions of appropriate security by an independent, nonpartisan trade information service. Statistics should be compiled to identify potential export opportunities, measure them, and assign priorities of value and importance. Government efforts should be targeted at such export opportunities.●

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE BUDGET RESOLUTION

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, let me indicate to my colleagues in the Chamber and those who may be listening in their offices that we intend to call up Senate Concurrent Resolution 32 within the next 15 to 20 minutes. I am waiting for Senator DOMENICI, the chairman of the Budget Committee, and right now he is involved in a meeting and will be free in a few moments.

It would then be my intention to call up Senate Concurrent Resolution 32 and offer a series of amendments so that we might have a vote on the so-called leadership package. Of course, we invite cosponsors on both sides of the aisle. We think it has a lot of merit. There may be a few flaws in it, which will be found in any large package. We hope it would indicate, not just from a partisan standpoint, but also as a reflection of the general consensus in this Chamber, that we need a deficit reduction package.

Someone has to start and, as I understand, that obligation generally falls to the majority. If you want to be the majority, you have to start. So we intend to do that, to try to get a vote on the package, if I do not mess it up along the route sometime later this evening.

I guess the maximum it could take would be around 7 hours, after we start. No, I guess that is not the maximum, since Senator BYRD just indicated with his eyes that it could be much longer. [Laughter.] I am reminded that he is correct. It could happen within 7 hours. It could be less, but it also could be a great deal longer. It is my hope that we could have a vote on the package before the day is out; if not, tomorrow.

by those who defend in that way or any way the President's decision. One distinction is between collective guilt and community responsibility. If what is meant by collective guilt is that all in Germany by citizenship alone bear a common guilt, I do not believe in that concept at all.

But there is a real difference between collective guilt and community responsibility. I do believe in community responsibility if by that is meant that a society collectively must acknowledge the evils that grew within that society and their debt to its victims. Nazism, after all, did grow within a particular society, with millions participating, with millions of others acquiescing, and with millions losing their lives as a result. It was not imposed Nazism by an invading army from another land.

A second distinction is between compliance with orders and exertion of individual will. We did not punish every individual within German society, whether members of the general public or rank and file military personnel for compliance with orders of their national government. But at the same time, it is not necessary that those nations who fought Germany pay equal honor to the vast majority who complied with the national orders and to the minority within Germany who bravely pursued against the Nazis their own individual conscience, often to their death at the hands of their own countrymen.

A third distinction that is important is the proper one between facing the future and forgetting the past. There is no contradiction necessarily between the two and, indeed, in this case there is an absolute congruity because unless we do in fact weep over the incalculable spilling of innocent blood, the future can go dangerously awry.

I thank the gentleman from California very much for giving me this opportunity to speak.

Mr. LEVINE of California. I thank the gentleman from Michigan.

Madam Speaker, may I inquire as to how much time I have remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mrs. BURTON of California). The gentleman from California [Mr. LEVINE] has 33 minutes remaining.

Mr. LEVINE of California. I thank the Chair.

I would be pleased to yield to the distinguished gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ALEXANDER].

Mr. ALEXANDER. I thank the gentleman from California for yielding. I will not take much time.

Madam Speaker, I wish to join the gentleman in his special order today, asking the President to cancel his planned trip to Bitburg, the situs of the burial ground for some of the SS officers, formerly associated with the Nazi Party in Germany.

I had occasion a few years ago to travel to Israel and to visit the Holocaust Museum in Jerusalem with my little daughter who had never witnessed some of the film that she saw there, some of the horrible, grotesque atrocities pictured there that were inflicted upon human beings. She was horrified, as I was reminded of the horrors of the Nazis which were inflicted upon the Jewish people in World War II.

I felt, when the flak occurred announcing the President's visit to the cemetery, that it was a very insensitive act on the part of any official of the U.S. Government, much less the President of our great country, to bestow the honor of visiting a cemetery where these monsters are buried. The only good that I can think that could possibly come of this visit is that it may possibly heighten the visibility of the atrocities of World War II so that little children who were not born during that era may be reminded of the indelible horrors that occurred before their birth so they might learn of these terrible inhumanities to man.

As I was made aware of the fact that 40 percent of the American people were revealed in a poll today as not knowing which side the United States fought on during the Vietnam War, it is possible that some value may occur from the President's visit to this cemetery and his presence there will give those of us who are sensitive to those atrocities a forum to mind others that civilized humanity shall never allow those atrocities to occur again.

Mr. LEVINE of California. I thank the gentleman from Arkansas.

Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to yield to the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. SCHUMER].

Mr. SCHUMER. I thank the gentleman for yielding, and congratulate him for reserving time for this very important special order.

Madam Speaker, let me say that this trip of the President's has pained me greatly. One cannot understand why the President is actually going. One hears so many different explanations, but none of them make any sense. None of them have refuted the idea of going to a different place where the SS is not buried, where one could honor the many millions of Germans who were not part of Nazism—those who suffered on the home front and those who suffered in the war as so many other people did. Yet, through the din and noise and everything else that has emanated from the White House recently, we have not heard a single reason why Bitburg is a better place to visit than the grave of Konrad Adenauer, or of Pastor Neimoller, the great German theologian, or of the resistance fighters—the many thousands and hundreds of thousands of Germans who resisted quietly and with arms, with voices, with thoughts, and with hearts. Or the President could honor a symbol of the new Germany, the generation that was born after the war.

Mr. President, do not go to Bitburg. By insisting on visiting Bitburg, Mr. President, you are saying that there is not another site in Germany that is untainted. We have heard not from the President but from some of his advisers that Helmut Kohl has asked him to visit. Helmut Kohl is an ally of the President's, as West Germany is an ally of the United States, an ally that we need and deeply appreciate. But there are times in diplomacy and politics when a friend comes to you and says, "Please do me this favor," and you say to that friend, "I would do almost anything you ask, but I must draw the line. I cannot do this. Let me do the favor in another way, at another time, in another place."

Morality does enter into politics every so often. There has never been a more appropriate time that morality should enter into politics than today. I find it somewhat ironic that Richard Nixon and Henry Kissinger, the prime practitioners of real politics, hard-nosed, brasstacks politics, are being cited as a reason, as a bolster, for the President going to Bitburg when it is not the type of diplomacy that they practiced, necessary as it often is, that is needed now.

Mr. President, I know you do not intend this, but you are sending a signal. You are sending a signal to thousands of people in Germany and France and England and Italy, and yes, in this country and in many other countries, to the small minority who are fanatics, who are neo-Nazis. You are sending a signal to them that their hatred is OK. You are not saying that it is OK, but in their warped minds, when you visit that cemetery, they will believe it is OK. And lest you think, Mr. President, that this hatred is insignificant and far away, let me read to you some lines from the very popular German magazine, Quick. The lines, quoted in the New York Times, are from an article entitled, "Reagan visit in Germany: The Power of the Jews," and it reads, talking about Jewish Americans:

> Their protests were accompanied by a gigantic press campaign in which not only Jewish commentators recalled the suffering of Europe's Jews under the Nazis. The major television networks broadcast anti-German films; theaters put dramas of Jewish suffering in their programs.

The article referred to "the powerful influence of Jewish Cabinet ministers such as Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger, surrounding Reagan." Caspar Weinberger happens to be a practicing Episcopalian.

Quick also asserted, that "the Jewish lobby dominates U.S. commerical television networks and many newspapers."

Mr. President, is this any more evidence than you need? Do not give a signal, an unintended signal but a real signal. Do not go to Bitburg. Choose another site. There are many people in my district, tens of thousands, who are Holocaust survivors. When you walk down a shopping street in my district in the summer, when people are wearing short sleeves, you can see tattooed numbers on people's arms. These people want reconciliation with Germany, too. But they do not want it at the graves of the SS. Nor do American veterans want reconciliation at the graves of the SS.

A man came to me in my district just yesterday and he told me that he and his family have lived in this country for a long time. A cousin of his was one of the American prisoners captured by the Germans at the Battle of the Bulge and massacred by the Waffen SS at Malmedy. American POW's with their hands up in the air, walking along being brutally machine gunned.

The tragedy of Nazism is not limited to any one group. The horror, the blackness, the emptiness of Nazism is not limited, and it must never be forgotten. We cannot wash it over. We should build a foundation between West Germany and ourselves, but not at the gravesite of the SS, because reconciliations such as that can never be.

Mr. President, all of us who have spoken here on this special order, and many, many millions of Americans and people of the world are asking you, please do not visit Bitburg.

□ 1600

Mr. LEVINE of California. Madam Speaker, I thank the gentleman from New York for his extremely thoughtful and important remarks.

I am now very pleased to yield to my friend, the distinguished gentleman from Nevada [Mr. REID].

Mr. REID. Madam Speaker, I had the good fortune this morning of attending a burial at Arlington National Cemetery. I participated in this gravesite service honoring my friend from Nevada, J. Lyn Smith, a paratrooper in the Second World War. This is a great contrast to the proposed trip to a German cemetery of our President.

Madam Speaker, I do not think any reasonable person can assert that the President's decision to go to Bitburg during his trip to West Germany next month was provoked by any mean spirit within him, or by irreverance to the memory of American and allied veterans of World War II. Apparently the President was asked to make this visit by a tearful Chancellor Kohl. When he accepted, the President did not know there were SS soldiers buried there. Now he knows.

If he does not alter his plans, he risks searing the sensibilities not only of survivors of the Holocaust, but of any one who can identify with the victims of Nazi Germany's hateful edict. Clearly, this encompasses a lot of people. Both the House and the Senate have directed letters to the President exhorting him to reconsider the Bitburg component of his trip. Large elements of the American public have urged better judgment. And some of our allies have expressed their reservations over this decision, as well.

As if this weren't enough to compel a change, surely, too, the Soviets will have a field day with this fodder for anti-American propaganda. Why bring this upon ourselves?

President Reagan misdiagnoses where the test of his integrity lies in this whole dilemma. He won't be accused of lacking integrity for recanting what is a bad decision. Instead he stands to lose far more by clinging to this mistake, having to lay a wreath and make a speech at Bitburg—where 47 SS soldiers are buried—and then confront a tide of negative repercussions.

Because the only major player that Reagan would need to mollify if he chooses another cemetery is Kohl, certainly this ill-advised decision can be turned around. There is still time for the President to reschedule his itinerary. I implore him to do so.

Mr. LEVINE of California. Madam Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. REID], and I am now pleased to yield to my friend, the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FRANK].

Mr. FRANK. Madam Speaker, I thank the gentleman from California for taking out this special order to try and get across the fundamental point that we are seeking to make.

I do not know anyone in the House nor anyone in Washington to whom I have spoken who objects to firm, friendly, solid relations between America and West Germany. What we object to is the notion that you have to include a visit to a cemetery where there are Nazi soldiers, particularly the SS, as a means of doing that.

The West Germans have a great deal of which to be proud. Out of that terrible event of the Nazi regime, for which German society was responsible, they have come to the situation where today West Germany stands out as a respected, democratic nation. Indeed their East German brothers and sisters have to be physically restrained from coming to this new, prosperous, democratic nation of West Germany.

It is important that we honor that accomplishment, but not by denying what went before. In fact, it is a measure of the accomplishment when we realize what went before, and there is no inconsistency at all between a recognition of what West Germany has accomplished today and a continued decision that there can be no forgetting, no reconciliation, and no relaxation of what has to be a universal human hatred of the Hitler regime. There is no inconsistency there.

In fact, we are not talking now simply about bad public relations on the part of the President. We are talking about a misperception that says there has to be some honor and some fealty paid to the people who fought for and defended the Nazi regime as a means of forging and continuing to have our close links with West Germany.

Yes; I understand the West German Government has asked President Reagan to do this. They are mistaken, and there cannot be a serious argument, after all that has transpired between our own Nation and West Germany since 1945, from the Marshall plan on to the current very heavy stationing of American troops there.

Through good, economic relations, through all that we have been through together, it is inconceivable that anyone can argue that this visit to the cemetery is necessary. It is a very grave error that the President made. He has consistently compounded the error time and again by his statements and by his explanations. It is not too late. You do not show weakness by admitting when you made a mistake. The weakness is in persisting in this mistake and in compounding it as the President has done.

Madam Speaker, I thank the gentleman from California for yielding.

Mr. LEVINE of California. Madam Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FRANK], and I am very pleased to yield now to my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FEIGHAN]

Mr. FEIGHAN. Madam Speaker, I share the concern expressed by so many Members of this House about the President's planned trip to the German military cemetery in Bitburg, West Germany. The ceremony is an affront to the memory of all who died at the hands of Hitler's legions and to all those who sacrificed to ensure that freedom would endure in Western Europe.

Surely, it is inappropriate for an American head of state, representing the people who liberated Germany and Western Europe from the greatest horrors in the history of humankind, to participate in a ceremony of remembrance for those who fought to extend the terrors of nazism during the Second World War. I cannot at all understand how this terrible ceremony was ever contemplated to be appropriate; nor can I imagine why Chancellor Kohl and President Reagan insist on going through with it.

I fully share the President's goal of increasing reconciliation between the German and the American people. Yet, the placement of a wreath at a military cemetery containing SS graves undermines that goal considerably. The American and German people have come together in the postwar years because of our shared commitment to the enduring values of peace, freedom, and democracy. Since the defeat of nazism in Europe, the people of West Germany and of West Berlin have dedicated and demonstrated their commitment to those values.

Rather than commemorate the deaths of many who died opposing those values, might it not be more appropriate to commemorate the lives of those who fought for freedom and a progressive future in postwar Germany? I wrote to President Reagan 2 weeks ago suggesting that the cemetery ceremony be replaced with one at the grave of Konrad Adenauer, the German Chancellor whose courage and leadership did so much to restore the trust and faith that Americans and Germans feel for one another. Instead, the President has decided to go ahead with his visit to Bitburg, while adding a ceremony at Bergen-Belsen.

The tragic initial decision to go to Bitburg is only exacerbated by the insensitivities expressed by those who believe that a trip to the Bergen-Belsen concentration camp can in some way add balance. How can anyone believe that a wreath-laying ceremony in a cemetery containing Nazi Waffen SS could be balanced by another event? The only appropriate action must be a cancellation of the Bitburg ceremony.

Over 2,400 years ago, Sophocles, in "Antigone," wrote an eternal truth that President Reagan and Chancellor Kohl would be well to remember. "All men make mistakes," he wrote, "but the just man admits his error and repairs the pain he has caused. The only sin is pride."

It would be a tragic error if the President's insistence on visiting the Bitburg ceremony undermined the spirt of reconciliation that has existed between our two countries for some time. Since the late 1940's, when Americans came to aid of West Berliners during their hour of need—during the Berlin blockade—Germans have known that the American people supported their freedom and were willing to take risks to preserve and defend it. Our efforts under the Marshall plan helped to forge a growing and vibrant economy there, and our work in NATO has ensured that all West Germans have had the chance to live in peace and freedom.

Madam Speaker, the President's trip to West Germany should not be used to gloss over the tragedies in the past or to rewrite history. I believe it should commemorate America's participation in the conquering of Hitler, the ending of the Holocaust, and the liberation of Western Europe from the grip of Nazi rule. I commend my colleagues for calling this special order. Chancellor Kohl and German people must understand how sincerely we oppose the Bitburg ceremony and the presence of President Reagan in a Nazi graveyard. I urge them to change their plans and work to arrange an event that will appropriately celebrate our two countries' continuing efforts to maintain the peace and freedom of Western Europe.

Mr. LEVINE of California. Madam Speaker, I thank my colleague for his remarks.

I am very pleased now to yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GILMAN].

Mr. GILMAN. Madam Speaker, I thank the gentleman from California [Mr. LEVINE] for making this time available to us to discuss this important issue and to reiterate my own deep concerns about the President's proposed visit to the Bitburg Cemetery in Germany.

In the past few days a great deal of discussion has focussed on the decision process involved in this matter, as well as the options available to the President to alter this decision. In today's Washington Post, mention was made that the President now plans to visit the Bitburg Cemetery for only a very brief time, while arranging a much more lengthy visit to the Bergen-Belsen concentration camp. It is obvious that many people are working to encourage the President to change his mind about visiting Bitburg, and I again reiterate my own suggestion that a more appropriate site of reconciliation would be to lay a wreath at the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier in Germany.

The events of the last few weeks have caused a great deal of personal anguish to many of my own constituents. My 22d Congressional District in New York has a high percentage of veterans of World War II, as well as concentration camp survivors. I have received more personal pleas and outcries from them in less time than I have on any other issue. Some of those veterans had families who perished in the camps, so that the Americans were not just fighting for freedom and democracy but the very lives of their own brethren. This intense, personal dedication deserves a noble response on our part, and on the part of our President. Elie Wiesel and others have responded to this crisis of anguish most eloquently, and all have spoken from the heart. Their appeal is not political, it is humanitarian. As Americans, we cannot in good conscience honor those who dedicated themselves to the singleminded act of genocide. It does not matter that many of these soldiers were young men; the SS was a voluntary branch of the Nazi regime, with a 2-year strict training program. Sworn enemies of the Jews, these SS soldiers fulfilled Hitler's orders to make Europe judenrein—empty of Jews. These same SS soldiers perpetrated a monstrous massacre of our own Allied troops, without any regard to the moral implications of their barbaric actions.

Madam Speaker, I join with my colleagues in appealing to our President to reconsider his visit to the Bitburg Cemetery as an improper setting for his comemorative wreath-laying ceremony.

□ 1610

Mr. LEVINE of California. Madam Speaker, I thank the gentleman from New York.

I am very pleased to yield to the distinguished gentleman from North Dakota.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Madam Speaker, I guess one of the most difficult things in politics is to say simply, "Look, I goofed."

The White House has clearly made an error in judgment in deciding that it is appropriate for the President of the United States to visit the Bitburg Cemetery. There are numerous reasons that should compel the White House to change its mind if it were not so hard in public life to say a mistake was made. This visit is an affront to the victims of the Holocaust; an affront to the soldiers who fought nazism, and a very serious mistake in foreign policy.

The young men who fought together in World War II from the United States and the Soviet Union met at the Elbe River. They recently commemorated an anniversary of that time when they marched together in opposition to the spreading terror of nazism.

For an American President now to go to a cemetery to honor those in the cemetery, including Nazi SS troops buried there, would give the Soviets an enormous propaganda coup. What they would do, you can imagine for the next year, 5 years, or 10 years, is send pictures all around the world about an American President visiting a cemetery paying honor to dead Nazi war SS troops.

This is an incredible foreign policy mistake. All of us need to be prepared to say, "Yes, on second thought, it's the wrong thing to do."

The President made a commitment. The President said, "Yes, I'll do that." But on reflection, it is not a good idea. It is not a good idea for him. It is not a good idea for this country.

So I think, along with my distinguished colleague from California and others who had made the case very eloquently, it is time for the President and the White House to say, "Yes, we blew this one. What we are proposing to do doesn't make sense and, yes, we are going to change our minds because changing your mind when you are proposing to do something wrong is the right thing to do."

It is the right thing for the President. I hope the President changes his mind.

I thank the gentleman for taking this special order.

Mr. LEVINE of California. Madam Speaker, I thank the gentleman.

In closing, let me thank all of those who have participated in this special order on both sides of the aisle, and all those who participated just before this special order in the presentation of the very important resolution that has strong, bipartisan support urging the President to reconsider his trip.

Let me thank all of those who constitute a clear majority of both this House on a bipartisan basis and the other body on a bipartisan basis who have urged Chancellor Kohl to reconsider his invitation to our President with regard to this ill-conceived plan.

Let me in terms of recapturing some of what was said by so many people, again on both sides of the aisle, summarize simply by saying that this is not designed to be a political issue. This is an issue where Democrats and Republicans together have joined in a very respectful fashion to urge the President of the United States to reconsider an ill-conceived decision.

This, I might say on a personal note, is the first special order that I have ever taken out in my two terms in the House. I believe that this time should be reserved for issues on which one feels very deeply and in which there are very important concerns at stake.

I think we have seen from the people who have spoken here today how deeply people do feel on this issue. This is an issue on which people are speaking from the heart. You do not see people reading elaborate speeches from notes. You do not see people using lines that have been given to them by their staffs. This is an issue which is extremely clear on a variety of levels, on a moral level, on a foreign policy level, on a diplomatic level, and on all the levels that have been discussed here today. It is one that has beckoned forth deep sentiment from throughout this entire country and from citizens who are very good and close friends of our country from around the globe.

In the name of everything that is good in America and in the name of everything that we have stood for as a nation since the days of the Revolution and particularly in the name of reconciliation and healing with the people of Germany, on behalf of the Republicans and the Democrats who have spoken today, and on other days on the floor of this House, and in the other body, and so many citizens from around the globe, I earnestly hope and sincerely urge the President to reconsider this very unfortunate decision.

● Mr. DELLUMS. Madam Speaker, the President's persistent and wrongheaded determination to visit a West German military cemetery at Bitburg that contains the graves of at least 47 Waffen SS members, while canceling a similar visit to the original "model" Nazi concentration camp at Dachau, will leave a scar of shame on the national memory for generations to come.

This decision is a deliberate affront to all people of conscience, regardless of national origin, ethnic or religious background, because it honors the victimizers at the expense of their victims. The SS in all its perverse manifestations were the ultimate subversion of the Judeo-Christian ideals that have been the very foundation of Western civilization.

The SS were the implementers of Hitler's "final solution" who were directly responsible for the genocide of almost 6 million Jews. They were the mass murders who exterminated equal numbers of non-Jews in the concentration camps because of their opposition to, or lack of suitability for inclusion in the criminal madness that was the Third Reich.

It was the Waffen SS that initiated a series of deliberate World War II atrocities, beginning in Poland in 1939, and continuing with the murder of 101 British prisoners of war at Le Paradis in 1940 to the wanton massacre of at least 71 uniformed U.S. military personnel at Malmedy, Belgium, in 1944. Some of the members from the SS unit that conducted the Malmedy massacre are buried in the cemetery at Bitburg.

What must the surviving American veterans of the Battle of the Bulge who helped to liberate Germany from the Nazi horrors think of a President who chooses to honor these murders while ignoring them?

What must the veterans of other Allied nations whose comrades were also massacred by the SS in virtually every country of Europe think of this decision which is historically ignorant and personally insensitive?

What must those Germans who resisted Hitler and Nazism think when Wehrmacht military and Waffen SS are publicly remembered—and implicitly honored—while their incredible courage is deliberately ignored—all in the name of "reconciliation"? What a tragic revision of recent history! What an incredible inversion of moral imperatives. • • •

At the same time the President is visiting the cemetery at Bitburg the SS will be having a public reunion in Bavaria, not far from the site of Dachau. The President is also scheduled to meet with Franz Joseph Strauss, the West German political leader in Bavaria who first urged the President not to visit Dachau because he feared "leftist, anti-American" protests.

How sad—and how shallow a series of excuses by the leaders of both countries. I urge the President to rescind his personal decision to visit the military cemetery at Bitburg and to focus his full attention on honoring the victims of Nazism, not its perpetrators. To do any less in our name is to dishonor us all.●

● Mr. RODINO. Madam Speaker, some have called the President's decision to go to the Bitburg Cemetery a political error, a public relations gaffe. Others have called it a diplomatic mistake, particularly with the damage it appears to have done to our relations with our West German allies. But his decision is much more than a political or diplomatic mistake. It is a moral dagger that pierces the heart of so many Americans and Europeans who suffered under the iron fist of nazism. And it is a psychological assault on the Holocaust survivors—and on the relatives on the many who didn't survive—who must live with a memory haunted by the evil, grim specter of the Nazi final solution.

Imagine the inner tears of the survivors who heard the President say that the German World War II soldiers "were victims, just as surely as the victims in the concentration camps." Imagine the inner anguish of the survivors who heard the President decline a visit to Dachau, then agree to visit Bitburg, and then, after the press revealed that the cemetery contained the graves of the SS troopers, decided to visit Bergen Belsen to balance out his visits. We cannot balance out good and evil. If everyone is a victim, then no one is a victim.

Madam Speaker, I am concerned about reports that the President's advisers counseled him not to "cave in" on this decision. But who is he caving into, Holocaust survivors? American veterans?

For 40 years the American and German people have developed close ties because of a common faith in democracy. Our alliance is strong, and our shared goals are noble. Reconciliation between our two nations is a fact. A ceremony at Bitburg is unnecessary. There are many other ways to remember—a visit at the grave of Konrad Adenauer, a commemoration of the German resistance, a recognition of the allied dead. But why Bitburg? Why the pain for the survivors and the Allied veterans? Why tread on history?

Madam Speaker, allow me to quote from the moving remarks of Elie Wiesel:

I, too, wish to attain true reconciliation with the German people. I do not believe in collective guilt, nor in collective responsibility. Only the killers were guilty. Their sons and daughters are not. And I believe • • • that we can and we must work together with them and with all people. And we must work to bring peace and understanding to a tormented world that * * * is still awaiting redemption.

Madam Speaker, Bitburg is not the door to redemption. I implore the President: for the sake of history, and for the sake of the living, please don't go.●

● Mr. WEISS. Madam Speaker, I rise to urge the President to cancel his plans to visit the Bitburg Cemetery, where, in addition to German soldiers, he will be honoring Waffen SS members, who conducted the Nazi genocide against the Jewish people.

Mr. Reagan's trip to Germany—his belated addition of a visit to a concentration camp, and his refusal to cancel a stop at Bitburg—reflects a moral and historical blindness to the suffering of the victims of Hitler's Germany. No dramatic speech by the President or public relations extravaganza by his advancemen can heal the wounds opened by President Reagan's insensitivity.

Scheduling for the trip has been blighted by moral obtuseness and misjudgment. In February the President first indicated he would not visit a German concentration camp site, saying he wanted to avoid opening old wounds while in Germany. Then, he added the stop at the Bitburg Military Cemetery. On April 18, he justified this visit by explaining that German soldiers who died defending nazism were "just as surely" victims as the 6 million Jews and millions of other nationalities tortured and slaughtered in Hitler's gas chambers.

President Reagan now stubbornly refuses to admit he made a mistake. After a direct plea not to visit Bitburg from the Chairman of the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Council and Buchenwald survivor, Elie Wiesel, the President still resists altering his plans. Simon Wisenthal, a Holocaust survivor who searches for Nazi war criminals still at large, denounced the Bitburg stopover while declining the President's invitation to Bitburg. The U.S. Senate urged the President to reassess his plans. And last week, 257 Members of this body wrote Chancellor Helmut Kohl asking him to withdraw his invitation to Reagan to lay a wreath at Bitburg.

Even with the added trip to Bergen-Belsen, the Bitburg visit is morally wrong. It prevents us from paying proper tribute to the victims of nazism and the Americans who fought that evil. It is an improper way to pay tribute to the free and democratic Federal Republic of Germany. And, it is an improper way to pay tribute to heroic Germans that resisted Hitler's efforts in World War II.

The President is now scrambling to find a politically acceptable way to visit Bitburg when there is no such alternative except not to visit the cemetery. Some assert that it would be a sign of weakness for the President to cancel his visit. On the contrary, this is an opportunity for the President to present a lesson about the Holocaust for current and future generations. If the President cancels his Bitburg visit, the lesson will be an unambiguous one, and all the more powerful. It would certainly be a demonstration of personal, as well as our Nation's, resolve about human rights and freedom. This is a strong message, not a weak one.

"The issue here is not politics," said Elie Wiesel, "but good and evil." Unfortunately, the President fails to see the difference even when presented so plainly. Madam Speaker, the American people can distinguish between right and wrong.

I, too, believe that our friends in the Federal Republic of Germany should not collectively suffer guilt for the Nazi crimes, and on this 40th anniversary of V-E day we should celebrate our friendship. However, I am afraid to think of what that day will symbolize to the world when the President of the United States lays a wreath at the graves of SS troops. I urge the President to cancel his trip to the Bitburg Cemetery.●

● Mr. EDGAR. Madam Speaker, my colleagues, I'm sorry that we all have to be here today. To you, to me, to most Americans, it's obvious that the President should not lay a wreath before the graves of the SS at Bitburg. But today, after weeks of controversy, we're here making a last desperate plea for President Reagan not to reopen the wounds of World War II.

I share the President's desire to achieve reconciliation. However, the Bitburg ceremony is guaranteed to be divisive, not unifying. It is guaranteed to be a hurtful act, not an act of healing.

I believe Elie Wiesel said it best when he accepted his medal at the White House 11 days ago. He said:

I too wish to attain true reconciliation with the German people. I do not believe in collective guilt, nor in collective responsibility. . . . we can and must work together with them and with all people. And we must work to bring peace and understanding to a tormented world that, as you know, is still awaiting redemption . . .

The issue, as Mr. Wiesel said, is not one of politics, but one of good and evil. The President should not be attempting to heal by honoring the graves of SS soldiers, Hitler's elite corps who ran the death camps and participated in the massacre of American prisoners of war. A ceremony recognizing even one individual who participated in the Nazi war crimes denigrates the purpose of the President's trip and works against reconciliation.

There is still time for the President to change his plans, to honor the grave of a German member of the resistance, or Chancellor Adenauer, who did so much for postwar reconciliation. There is still time for the President to change his plans, to contribute to the healing of wounds.

Let me close on a personal note. Veterans and members of the Jewish community have been vocal in their opposition to the President's trip; some have even said that this is a "Jewish issue" or a "veterans issue."

Jews and veterans should not be alone; I submit that this is an issue for all Americans. As a Methodist minister, I believe that all of us—Christians and Jews, Republicans and Democrats, men and women—should speak out to insist that good triumphs, that healing triumphs. Working together, we can pursue and achieve justice.●

● Mr. YATES. Madam Speaker, I participate in this special order today with a sense of fundamental sadness that is rooted in disappointment and disbelief. When I spoke to the House on April 15 about the serious mistake that the President was making with the scheduled visit to the Bitburg Cemetery, I, like many others, believed that the President would recognize this and the cemetery would be dropped from his itinerary.

This has not happened. A bad situation has become much worse and there is now a very troubling, Kafka-like quality to the whole event. It is as though the ability to alter the trip was beyond the reach or power of mortal man. But it is not too late, and the President should listen to reason.

Those SS graves in Bitburg are symbolic. They represent the darkest chapter in modern world history. To go to that cemetery with the wreath, the flags, and all implications that the visit carries with it is a mistake of tremendous proportions for this country, Germany, and the West as a whole. There can be no reconciliation with the SS. As Elie Wiesel said to the President: "That place, Mr. President, is not your place. Your place is with the victims of the SS."●

● Mr. DASCHLE. Madam Speaker, even though President Reagan is leaving on his European trip tomorrow, there is still time for him to cancel his visit to Germany's military cemetery at Bitburg.

And he must cancel the event.

The President of the United States should salute today's Germany—the Germany that is a model of Democracy, not honor a dark moment in human history when thousands upon thousands of Jewish men, women, and children were murdered simply because of their heritage.

The President of the United States should pay tribute to 40 years of peace between the United States and Germany, not honor German soldiers who were responsible for tens of thousands of American casualties.

The President of the United States should visit a cemetery where Allied forces are buried, not a cemetery that was once used as a staging area for the bloody Battle of the Bulge where more than 70,000 American GI's were killed.

The President of the United States should pay his respects to the victims of the Holocaust and its survivors, not lay a wreath at the gravesites of those who guarded the death camps from escape and outside interference.

The visit to Bitburg is a terrible mistake. It reopens old wounds. It is an insensitive decision that minimizes the sacrifices of American veterans and the suffering of Jews who were declared enemies of the state. It drives a wedge between the United States and Germany. And it goes against all that this Nation stands for, and has fought for, in its 200-year history.●

● Mr. GARCIA. Madam Speaker, the President's scheduled trip to the Bitburg Cemetery has caused a great deal of furor both among his supporters and those who do not always agree with him.

Why is there so much controversy over this visit? Why is a symbolic trip to a cemetery so important? Because symbolism is all the victims of the Holocaust have left. It is the only solace they can find from the horror they experienced. We cannot adequately imagine that horror; we can only pay respect through our remembrance.

The words "never again" ring loudly from the survivors and the families of the survivors of the Holocaust. But to make certain that those words have meaning, it is up to us to join with them in their efforts to keep the memory of this tragedy alive.

I think it is important that when we ask the President not to go to Bitburg we do so not as Democrats and Republicans, but as Americans who do not want our Nation to be in any way connected with the evil of the SS. The memory of the excesses of that evil must be preserved so that we can forever guard against this dark side of humanity. The President must not go to Bitburg and betray the vigilance of this memory.●

● Mr. McGRATH. Madam Speaker, the message is clear. The American people are distraught over the memories that the President's proposed trip reawakens. Pleas have come from all segments of our society imploring the President not to visit Bitburg's military cemetery.

I have never received such impassioned mail as that which this controversy has evoked. This outpouring reaffirms my belief that the President must find another way to signal our sincere reconciliation toward the democratic government that rose from the ashes of Nazi Germany 40 years ago.

I have heard from veterans, Holocaust survivors, and many people who do not fall into either category. I would like to share with you the sentiments they have expressed which highlight the height of the despair and confusion they feel.

I'm a veteran of World War II who lost many dear friends fighting for our country * * * In decorating and honoring the graves of ex-Nazis we are doing a disservice to the cherished memories and the ideals of our American war dead.—Mr. Benjamin Feldman, 5th District, New York.

As a refugee from Nazi Germany who lost his parents and innumerable dear ones in the Holocaust, as a volunteer for the draft for the U.S. Army who entered service prior to Pearl Harbor, as a participant of D-Day invasions of both North Africa and Sicily, having been wounded in action in Normandy, as a recipient of the purple heart, the bronze star, and the Belgian Croix de Guerre Avec Palme, but above all as an American, I am sickened and offended by the insensitivity displayed toward the memory of the thousands of American servicemen killed by those whose graves you intend to visit on your upcoming trip to Germany.—Siegmund Spiegel, 5th District, New York.

One doesn't have to be a World War II veteran or Jewish to resent the idea of the President of the United States honoring Nazi war dead * * * Millions of mature 60 plus and elderly 70 plus Americans, like us remember vividly Allied sacrifices in World War II—including American prisoners of War butchered by Nazi troops near that cemetery * * *. Many living Germans were part of Hitler's efforts to build a Reich that would rule the world * * *. Honoring all war dead is a meaningless blurring of the fact that many of those dead don't deserve honor.—Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Magnell, 5th District, New York.

As a combat veteran of WW II, I feel debased by President Reagan's decision to visit the German cemetery that holds the remains of so many of the Nazi criminals of that conflict * * *. We can never let the world forget what the Germans of that era did to humanity. To honor those who participated in that horror is an insult, not only to Americans, but to all people, all over the world who value the right of every human to be allowed to think and worship according to his own beliefs.—Mr. Gil Malawista, 5th District, New York.

I share the concern and opposition expressed by my constituents. Currently, there are numerous groups trying to convince the world that the Holocaust never took place. This offensive and preposterous assertion is sure to gain some acceptance if the President lays a wreath at a cemetery where members of the elite SS guard are buried.

The fundamental lesson of the Holocaust is never again. As elected representatives of our Nation, our responsibility is to assure that this lesson never fades. I commend the gentleman from California and New York for reserving this time so that this very expression may be relayed to the President.●

● Ms. MIKULSKI. Madam Speaker, I rise today with a deep sense of outrage at President Reagan's proposed plan to visit the cemetery at Bitburg, Germany. This cemetery contains the graves of German SS officers, the Nazi elites who brutally carried out Hitler's plan to exterminate the Jews of Europe. Regardless of the intent of including Bitburg on the President's itinerary, or the addition of other events to the schedule, President Reagan should immediately cancel his plan to lay a wreath at Bitburg.

This month we have been commemorating the 40th anniversary of the end of World War II and the liberation of the Nazi death camps. Part of remembering the dead and the other victims of nazism is never forgetting those responsible for the Holocaust. President Reagan's plan to lay a wreath at Bitburg is far from a gesture of reconciliation with modern Germany. Rather it is opening the wounds of thousands of Holocaust survivors and Gold Star mothers everywhere. Furthermore, it is paying homage to the memory of 47 Nazi SS members, participants in the torture and murder of millions of innocent people.

I have written personally to President Reagan asking him to remove Bitburg from his itinerary. In my letter I also encouraged him to do everything possible to continue our Nation's friendship with present-day Germany. I do not believe in collective guilt. But I must join with Elie Wiesel who said: "The issue here is not politics, but good and evil." The American President's place is with the victims, not the perpetrators, of Nazi atrocities.

Our current friendship with Germany does not make us forget the past. Out of respect for those who died and suffered, out of respect for the lessons of the Holocaust, I join with my colleagues and friends in the Jewish community in calling for the President to cancel his trip to Bitburg.●

● Mr. LENT. Madam Speaker, I join with my colleagues today in expressing my deep concern over the President's plans to visit the Bitburg Cemetery in West Germany. The President's trip to Bitburg is intended to improve diplomatic relations with Germany but it has had the opposite effect here in the United States. The President's stated intention to visit a military cemetery in Bitburg has opened old wounds and sharply divided this Nation.

Some would portray this visit as an issue of primary concern to the Jewish community, but that is inaccurate. It is a Jewish issue, but it is also an issue of concern to gentiles. Many of the major veterans organizations have protested against the President's visit. They are disturbed because the President's visit would honor the murderers of their fallen comrades, as well as the perpetrators of the most horrifying slaughter in the history of mankind.

I had hoped that the eloquent speech given by Elie Wiesel at the White House last week would change the President's mind and show him the folly of his plans. While I sincerely believe the President was deeply moved by Mr. Wiesel's words, he apparently feels that he has made some personal commitment to Chancellor Kohl as one head of government to another.

The administration should recognize that a decision that causes such controversy at home is worthless, no matter what its value abroad. They should be working with the West Germans to develop an option that will benefit both sides and alienate no one. I join with Elie Wiesel and the countless others who believe that the President's place is not in Bitburg, his place is with the victims.●

● Mr. ADDABBO. Madam Speaker, I rise to join my colleagues in urging President Reagan to cancel his visit to Bitburg Cemetery.

Certainly none of us has a problem with the President's stated desire to commemorate 40 years of peace and friendship with the people and Government of West Germany. But in doing so, the President must not ignore the horrors and brutality of the Nazi regime and should scrupulously avoid even the appearance of paying tribute to individuals who perpetrated crimes against humanity.

If the President wants to honor the victims of World War II, he does not have to look very far. All of Europe was a victim of the Nazi regime. The millions who were murdered in the death camps, the fallen soldiers of the Allied forces, the people and towns of Europe that were overrun and occupied by the Nazi war machine, the fighters in the German resistance movement, all were victims and all deserve to be honored by the President of the United States.

I am sure that it was never the President's intention to honor members of the SS. The planned visit to Bitburg was simply a result of poor judgment and bad advice. The most honorable course of action would be to admit the error and cancel the visit to the cemetery. I respectfully urge the President to reconsider his plans. It is not too late to find an alternative site for the President to mark 40 years of peace.●

● Mr. BUSTAMANTE. Madam Speaker, the proposed visit by President Reagan to the German war cemetery at Bitburg, billed as symbolic of our reconciliation with present-day Germany, actually undermines the genuine reconciliation our present alliance with Germany symbolizes. The juxtaposition of the symbol of reconciliation with that entombed in those graves, the greatest evil the world has suffered, can only pervert the symbol of reconciliation which we wish to express. We cannot reconcile ourselves with the past and its nefarious symbols. The SS, the elite corps of Nazi Germany, perpetrated the most grievous crimes against humanity ever recorded in history. The Nazis distorted the distinction between good and evil through the very distortion and perversion of symbols: the ones who at the gate of the death camp inscribed "Work makes Free"; the ones who called their mass deportations to death camps "resettlement"; the ones who sent their victims to the "showers" to "disinfect" them; the ones whose "Final Solution" meant the total annihilation of a whole people. Madam Speaker, how can we even symbolically reconcile ourselves with this past?

As the leader of the free world, President Reagan has the responsibility to honor and uphold the values for which countless Americans fought and died in their struggle to free Europe from the Nazi tyranny which almost engulfed the world. Americans fought for the preservation of freedom in the world; for the survival of democracy which affords its citizens equal protection under law. And many died for the free Europe we have today; including democratic West Germany. Is it then fitting for the beneficiaries of this legacy of freedom to reconcile themselves with the very evil which would undermine our hard-won liberties?

Madam Speaker, I join my appeal with those of my colleagues that he cancel his visit to the Bitburg Cemetery; a visit that only revives memories of Nazi atrocities and reopens bitter wounds. Mr. Reagan would demonstrate true leadership if he were to cancel his proposed visit to the cemetery.

Madam Speaker, the reconciliation that has, in fact, existed for some time cannot be justified if it rests on the scattered cinders of forgetfulness.●

● Mr. SMITH of Florida. Madam Speaker, President Reagan's decision to carry out his plans to visit the Bitburg Cemetery honors those directly responsible for the deaths of millions of American soldiers and Jews. Those buried in this cemetery are the perpetrators of some of the greatest crimes of humanity during this century. Many of the German soldiers buried at Bitburg were members of the Waffen SS, the combat arm of an elite Nazi unit.

As a Jew who has personally suffered family losses, I am outraged that 40 years after the end of the world's most atrocious regime, the President of the United States intends to honor the German military war dead. This is an indignation that offends not only the souls of the 6 million Jews who were slaughtered at the hands of the Nazis, but the 400,000 American servicemen who lost their lives in World War II as well. Rather than healing old wounds, this has opened them up again. Rather than increasing understanding, it increases misunderstanding. Rather than celebrating the future, it has rekindled the horrors of the past.

After observing the sense of outrage from nearly all sectors of the American population, the President was quick to add a stop at the Bergen-Belsen Concentration Camp to his itinerary; however, he continues to include the Bitburg ceremony on his schedule. Visiting the site of a Nazi concentration camp where tens of thousands of Jews were brutally murdered can not be considered a trade-off to visiting Bitburg.

To voice my opposition to the President's planned trip to Bitburg Cemetery, I have cosigned several letters with many of my colleagues advising the President of Congress' belief that there is a more appropriate way to highlight the peace and friendship between West Germany and the United States. In addition, I am an original cosponsor of House Concurrent Resolution 125, a sense of the Congress resolution that the President of the United States should not honor the memory of those responsible for the deaths of millions by visiting Bitburg.

We should not honor the guilty. We know the pain of remembering the Nazi genocide and feel the loss of each life as if it were our own. Hitler's reign ended 40 years ago, but for the many who survived the camps, the hiding, and the awful waiting, it happened yesterday. Therefore, we must remember, not honor, the Nazi barbarism, so that it may never happen again.●

● Mr. MICA. Madam Speaker, our President leaves tomorrow on a 10-day trip to Europe. Our President intends to visit a West German cemetery at Bitburg where 47 of the Third Reich's notorious Waffen (weapons) SS troops, as well as 2,000 German soldiers, lay buried. Many Americans, I being among them, strongly believe the President's plan to honor these men is ill-advised and insensitive.

Just 40 years ago, 6 million Jews, plus millions of other innocent people, were murdered in the Nazi Holocaust—victims of the SS organization that once included the 47 who lay buried at Bitburg. The aim of the SS was, according to SS leader Heinrich Himmler, to "find out, to fight and destroy all open and secret enemies of the Fuhrer, the national socialist movement and our racial resurrection." For a U.S. President to honor men with such a mission shows a tragic lack of understanding of Nazi atrocities.

Most of the soldiers buried at Bitburg died in the Battle of the Bulge in 1944, the most ferocious battle ever fought between Americans and Germans. Over 19,000 of our GI's died; about 50,000 were wounded. Every veteran who fought in this battle has vivid and bitter memories. Many will recall the news that during the battle, a Waffen SS battle group gunned down 71 American prisoners of war captured just north of Bitburg. Afterward, the SS soldiers used the bodies for target practice.

The President's decision to lay a wreath at Bitburg demonstrates a lack of sensitivity to those who suffered at the hands of the Nazis. The President should reconsider the inclusion of the Bitburg Cemetery in his forthcoming trip to West Germany. Instead, our Nation should pay honor to the memories of the millions of innocent Jewish victims and thousands of American and Allied soldiers who were victims of Nazi atrocities. We should honor the new bonds that have developed between our Nation and West Germany since World War II and in doing this look forward to a promising and flourishing relationship, not backward to the horrors of the past.●

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. LEVINE of California. Madam Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the subject of my special order today.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. FRANK. Madam Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take my special order now, which was previously called.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

A BROKEN PROMISE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FRANK] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. FRANK. Madam Speaker, the gentleman who preceded me, the gentleman from California, said that special orders ought to be used when one feels strongly, and that is precisely what I want to do today. I feel strongly for a couple reasons.

The subject is the very solemn, oft-repeated promise, that President Reagan made during the 1984 campaign that he would not reduce Social Security benefits and the fact that he has subsequently broken that promise.

Apparently when the initials S.S. are involved, the President has a somewhat flexible attitude toward promise-keeping. When the S.S. stands for Social Security, the promise is not worth very much. When it stands for Schutzstaffel, then apparently it is an obligation too solemn ever to be set aside.

I think the President is keeping the wrong promise. A commitment made in a conversation to the head of another government when nothing has been bargained for over that does not seem to me as important as the very solemn, very public pledge, made by the President of the United States as a candidate for reelection to the American people, when he said, "I won't be cutting your Social Security benefits."

□ 1620

Because the President has a proposal now before the Congress to reduce Social Security benefits by a substantial amount. In fact, a proposal came forward from the other body to reduce Social Security benefits, and in the compromise that was worked out, the President went them one better because the proposal that came forward as part of a so-called compromise for a 3-year reduction in the cost-of-living increase that Social Security recipients would be entitled to get is a deeper cut over that 3-year period than what had initially come out.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRANK. I yield to the gentleman from North Dakota.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Does the gentleman recall one of the Presidential debates in which the President said "You should never say never in politics, but I will say never"?

Mr. FRANK. I do recall that, and what he said never about, as the gentleman points out, was cutting Social Security benefits.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. That is precisely what he said: "I will never allow Social Security benefits to be cut." That was just several months ago. The paradox of this whole thing is that this President is participating in an effort that will lower Social Security checks from the present law's COLA in order to counter a buildup on the other side of the budget for the military. And that is precisely what we are talking about. We are talking about taking money from senior citizens, many of whom are at or near the poverty line, in order to build more submarines, jet fighters, tanks, or MX missiles.

The President's budget priorities are misplaced, and I appreciate the gentleman taking this special order to point that out.

Mr. FRANK. I thank my friend from North Dakota who has been a very staunch advocate for sensible priorities in the budget. He reminds us we are not talking about increased overall Federal spending. We are not talking about trying to increase what the President sent us in the deficit. We are talking about making those reductions in a sensible way and not taking Social Security benefits away from those who are entitled to them to fund General Dynamics' abuses of taxpayers' money or for MX missiles that we do not need or other waste elsewhere in the budget.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. If you deny someone, whose purchasing power has been eroded because of inflation, the opportunity to have that purchasing power restored through a COLA, that denial of those funds does not help the deficit. Social Security funds are raised through a payroll tax to be used only for Social Security. Some people around here are trying to play a game of using those Social Security revenues that they cannot use to offset deficits they create by an excess of military spending. That breeds the most incredible waste we have ever seen in this Government's history.

Mr. FRANK. The gentleman is correct.

You know, sometimes people forget what today is. But now the gentleman reminds me, and we can say, if people do not remember what the day is, today is the first of never, apparently, because we heard the President say he would never cut Social Security benefits, and he is now proposing to cut them. So as of today, it is the first of never.

I do not know what you do to your clock, but what you do, if you are old, to your bank account is watch it dwindle.

The gentleman is right. In 1983, the President signed into law, both Houses having passed an increase in Social Security taxes and a reduction at that point in Social Security benefits. And the argument was that that was necessary.

Some agreed; some disagreed. But that was then argued to be necessary to put Social Security on a sound footing so that the elderly would not have to worry.

What the President is now asking Congress to do is to take part of that increase in the regressive payroll tax of Social Security and use it to offset the deficit that we are getting because of General Dynamics abusers and because we are going to do the things in the military that are far beyond what we have to do.

We ought to be very clear about what the President has tried to suggest. Let us be very clear. When you have a law that now says elderly people are supposed to get every January—it used to be July but it has been pushed back 6 months—a cost-of-living increase equal to inflation, and you take that away from them, you are reducing their benefits below what they are now legally entitled to.

And then the President said, anyone who says I am reducing their benefits is lying in their teeth. I do not know how one lies in one's teeth and it would seem to me that it would be a very uncomfortable place to lie. But the fact is that the President's own calculation means that, in this one instance, he does understand what we are talking about.

He is the one who tells us that if we only give the Pentagon a 3-percent increase over and above inflation, that is a 7-percent overall increase, that that is austerity. So, for the Pentagon, they get full inflationary compensation plus 3 percent.

But if you are 82 years old and living at about the poverty level, receiving about $500 a month or a little bit less, you get 2 percent. And the President says he has not cut you and we know that that simply is not true.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. If the gentleman will yield one more time—those who listen to the gentleman and others should not conclude that we are not for trying to move this fiscal policy into some sort of balance. The mismatch between revenues this Government has and expenditures that the President proposes, which is a $180 billion deficit mismatch, has nothing at all to do with Social Security COLA's. We ought to adjust Social Security COLA's up or down based on the economic health of that system, not based on whether or not the President wants another 7, 9, or 13 percent in military spending.

This does not have anything at all to do with the general question of whether or not we ought to restrain spending. Of course we should. But we ought to do it in the right way.

Mr. FRANK. I just want to make it clear. I thank the gentleman for his remarks.

Larry Speakes, who is the official White House spokesperson—and, Madam Speaker, in the intermittent interest that some of the people on the Republican side have about the rules, I am going to ask unanimous consent that I may be allowed to quote. I would assure any Republicans watching, I am going to quote Larry Speakes, so I am sure they would not have any objection.

I ask unanimous consent that I be allowed to quote from some documents here, Madam Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore [Mrs. BURTON of California]. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. FRANK. I thank the Speaker.

On October 9, and I am going to insert some stuff in the RECORD, and one is a superb, thoughtful essay written by Robert Ball, a former Commissioner of Social Security, a man who participated in 1982 and 1983 in the proposal to reduce benefits at that time and raise taxes because he thought it was necessary, he has a magnificent refutation of the logic by which the President is trying to justify. And let us be very clear what the President has done. He made a promise when he ran for election that he would never cut Social Security benefits. He has broken that promise. He has asked the Congress to reduce the cost of living below what it now legally is supposed to be, not just for this fiscal year but for 2 additional fiscal years. For 3 full fiscal years, it would cost billions of dollars and put an awful lot of older people who are now barely above poverty back into poverty.

Here is what Mr. Speakes said, according to Mr. Ball:

When asked further on October 9 about the Social Security cost-of-living adjustment, White House spokesman Larry Speakes, and a reporter had this exchange:

"QUESTION. You say that benefits will not be reduced. The law includes a provision for increases in benefits based on cost of living. Does this guarantee those increases as well?

"Mr. SPEAKES. Yes. This is the law.

"QUESTION. And you say it doesn't include—that there will be no tampering and delaying or trimming of the cost of living?

"Mr. SPEAKES. No tampering, no nothing."

But unfortunately no nothing more clearly explains the Reagan program for Social Security recipients than no tampering. There is a clearcut violation of a pledge and an effort to reduce what, among the poorest people in this society, all older people living in poverty are going to get.

Mr. MORRISON of Connecticut. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRANK. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. MORRISON of Connecticut. I thank the gentleman for yielding. I want to thank him for asking for this time in order that we might explore this issue on Social Security because I think there has been a lot of misexplanation of what is going on. And a lot of people are being asked to think that freezing Social Security benefits or reducing the cost of living over a 3-year period by at least 2 percent every year is somehow a form of deficit reduction, and some kind of budget restraint, when it is nothing of the kind.

I think an important fact that should be emphasized is that the Social Security trust fund will take in $9.2 billion more next year, in 1986, than it is going to spend. So, if anything, the Social Security trust fund is making the deficit look smaller than it actually is, not bigger.

Mr. FRANK. If I could just interrupt the gentleman, I appreciate his statistics. If I am correct, the $9.2 billion is even if we pay out the currently mandated cost of living?

Mr. MORRISON of Connecticut. Absolutely. And I think it is important to go back and understand why it is we are in this fix where the dedicated funds in Social Security are made to look like they are reducing the deficit.

In fact, back in the 1960's and before the Social Security fund was kept separate from the Federal budget, because we understood that these dollars could not be used to fund other parts of the budget, they cannot be used for the military budget, they cannot be used for housing or for educational loans, and as such this money is not really available. But in 1969, the budgets were brought together and at that time the surplus in Social Security was used to hide the fact that we were running a deficit that we should not have been running then.

And here again we have got the same kind of a strategy. I wanted to underscore something that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FRANK] mentioned, and that is in 1983 the people of this country were told that we had to compromise, which we needed in Social Security, and that people, workers, would have to pay higher taxes and employers would have to pay higher taxes during the 1980's to ensure that the cost of living increases could be paid, that senior citizens would have to do without the cost-of-living increase for a 6-month period, which is a permanent reduction in people's benefits; but that was in order to secure the Social Security system for 75 years.

Well, here we are already 2 years later being told that this lead is off and, in fact, those tax increases which the gentleman quite properly describes as regressive, are to be used for something else, for a deficit reduction.

Well, I think that those who are advocating this reduction in Social Security benefits better be advocating giving those tax increases back to the workers and the employers. I cannot imagine any Member of this House coming on the floor and saying that he had a tax program to deal with the deficit and then saying the following: This tax program is only going to be on earned income, not on unearned income. You are only going to have to pay on the first $39,600 that you earn. If you earn more than that, that will be tax-exempt.

And if you are an employer you will pay no matter whether you are losing money or making money, you will still have to pay this tax. And any Member who came here proposing that kind of a tax increase to fight the budget deficit would not get one supporter.

Yet that is exactly what is being proposed with the cuts in Social Security.

Mr. FRANK. I thank the gentleman.

Let us drive this point home because people have to understand what the President of the United States is doing. He is, by his own description, Mr. Anti-Tax Increase.

You remember he made a couple of promises last year. One promise he made was no new increase in taxes, and when someone even suggested it, somebody on his side or somebody on the Democratic side, it came from both places, his answer was, "Make my day."

When someone talks about his promise not to raise taxes, he is Clint Eastwood. Of course, when someone says that they are going to violate his campaign promise not to cut Social Security benefits, he is Woody Allen. I mean he becomes a somewhat different character, or the Roadrunner, perhaps, getting as far away from his promises as he can.

But let us look at the effect of what his own tax policy is.

In 1983 his appointed commissioners, along with others, recommended an increase in the Social Security tax. That increase came from some people that Ronald Reagan, among others, the Speaker and the Senate majority leader, appointed.

He lobbied for and signed into law, Ronald Reagan, an increase in Social Security tax affecting every wage-earner in this country and the self-employed small business people; Ronald Reagan's appointees recommended the tax; Ronald Reagan lobbied for the tax; Ronald Reagan signed the tax into law, ostensibly to pay for Social Security benefits. Now he is asking Congress to take that tax increase he signed into law ostensibly to pay for Social Security benefits and to use it for his military foreign assistance; some will go to the Philippines, some will go to build an airport in Grenada, some of it will go to fly General Dynamics people around and not have them pay any taxes, some of it will go for the MX, some of it will go for some other purposes, some of it which might be useful purposes. But he has taken that tax increase that was explicitly to be used only for Social Security and ask us not to provide Social Security cost-of-living increases. As the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MORRISON] pointed out, even if the law, as it now stands is followed, and you know people are not getting rich off of Social Security. There is a small number of wealthy people who get Social Security. But the great bulk are not wealthy. Social Security continues to be the most effective, most broadly ranging antipoverty program in America today in the sense that it keeps people from that poverty line. And Ronald Reagan is going to deny them the money even though there will be under current law a $9 billion surplus generated by Social Security. I think he is trying to scoop some money from the Social Security trust fund and use it to cover up the deficit.

I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. MORRISON of Connecticut. I think that is exactly right. That should be disturbing to everyone who believes that the Social Security trust fund is a separate fund that guarantees our ability to keep the compact we have made between generations, that that trust fund will be maintained. This is the kind of step, once taken, that could easily be repeated time and time again.

I would emphasize that those who are supporting this 2-percent reduction in the COLA, they were talking about this change long ago, long before this particular proposal. They are not talking about deficit reduction; they are talking about Social Security reductions; CPI minus 2. We have heard that around this Chamber for 2 or 3 years now. This is a specific proposal. Those individuals have the right to advocate it, but they ought not hide it as if it were a deficit reduction. They want to reduce Social Security benefits. Let us debate that on its own terms. I think it will lose on its own terms.

Mr. FRANK. I thank the gentleman from Connecticut. He is absolutely right. There are people who have the bizarre notion that on the whole, old people in America have too much money. I must say, as any Member of Congress, that I meet with a lot of elderly people. I know the gentleman from Connecticut does because he has been very active on behalf of the elderly. I want to know where they are hiding all these rich old people, because I would like to find them, befriend them; maybe they will be nice to me. I have a lot of old people in my district, most of whom are nice to me, but unfortunately I have not found all of these rich ones.

I just want to make some statistical points here because it is true there are a few people who are on Social Security who are very wealthy. But the bulk of the people on Social Security are average working people who in their retirement years would be living in desperate poverty if we did not have a decent Social Security program.

Some of the people on Social Security are still in poverty. What the President is asking us to do is to deny compensation for the cost of living for the next 3 years to people who are living in poverty or who are just above poverty.

The Pentagon, remember, gets a full cost-of-living increase plus a 3-percent bonus under his plan. Elderly people get less than a third of that.

Let me read from a very useful report which I am going to put into the RECORD from the Democratic Study Group, "Rose Garden II." CBO estimates that Social Security, along with railroad retirement, provides 82 percent of total income for elderly recipient families classified as poor; 79 percent of people classified as near poor, income is less than 20 percent above the poverty line. It is a very important source, in addition, for many low-income persons who are not elderly, but who are disabled, who are widowers or widows caring for children. All of them are victimized.

CBO has said that the President's proposal to reduce the Social Security cost-of-living increase will do more to increase poverty than any other proposal before us or any other economic event of recent times. And it will also degrade those who are just above poverty.

Is there insistence that elderly people, having worked hard all their lives in factories, in stores, in hospitals, having raised children, that it is somehow a crime for them to be a little bit above the poverty level? Because that is what we are talking about. We are not talking about a proposal aimed at denying Social Security cost-of-living increases to a handful of wealthy people. President Reagan is asking that we deny half of the Social Security increase that elderly people are now legally entitled to get for the next 3 years up and down the line. The poorest people in this country by the hundreds of thousands will be victimized by this breach of promise by the President of the United States.

I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. MORRISON of Connecticut. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I think those statistics are very telling.

Another CBO statistic that I think drives this point home is that the Senate proposal, the Senate proposal that the President has endoresd and agreed to, the reduction in the COLA for the next 3 years, would put 650,000 senior citizens who are now at or above the poverty line into poverty.

We have already driven 250,000 senior citizens into that status by that 6-month cost-of-living delay in 1983. This is 650,000 more people.

Now we will hear some people argue that the problem is solved by a small increase in the so-called SSI, the supplmentary security income program and that that solves the problem. The fact is that it does nothing of the kind. The SSI benefits are themselves below the poverty line. So people who benefit from that will not be raised to poverty, but will be allowed to sink even lower, lower below the poverty line. And those who are in such desperate straits that they need to avail themselves of that program, will have to give up everything they saved in their lives. Virtually nothing in terms of assets can be held by a person who gets those kinds of benefits. So these people not only will be kept below poverty but pushed into even greater destitution by that plan that has been endorsed by the President.

Mr. FRANK. I thank the gentleman because the increase in SSI does not begin to undo the misery that will be inflicted on hard-working older people by this. I want to stress that because we are told that we have to be tough; people are going to say, "Well, these are tough times, so be tough," I do not mind people being tough in tough times; I do not mind people being tough in tender times. People who like being tough are entitled to be tough.

□ 1640

But how do you prove your toughness by saying to an 83-year-old woman living in a major metropolitan center, in an expensive, high cost-of-living area where she has lived all her life, and now she has no relatives left and no friends, and she is living entirely on Social Security and she is maybe getting $500 a month.

You prove your toughness by telling her that for the next 3 years she will get only half of the cost-of-living increase? That as her food goes up, her rent goes up and her light bill goes up, and her health care and her transportation goes up, she will get half what it needs to pay them?

I wish people with this need to show their macho would find someone other than these 83-year-old vulnerable people on whom to demonstrate it.

There are plenty of areas in this Federal budget. Let's look at the Pentagon. Let's look at the agricultural program, Let's look at almost any other place you want. And it is compounded by the fact that the President of the United States made this solemn promise.

We are being told—it is not simply a rhetorical ploy—we are being told by our friends, "Well, yes, he shouldn't go to the cemetery at Bitburg and he shouldn't go and honor the SS, but he promised." The promise he gave, over the phone or in person to Helmut Kohl, why is that so absolutely unbreakable when the election pledge he made—he said to people, in effect, and you do this when you are a candidate—"If you vote for me, I promise that I will not cut Social Security." He solicited people's votes.

Older people have been frightened. Let's make a couple points. The gentleman from Connecticut made another excellent point that I want to just echo, when he talked about the intergenerational compact.

Because when taxes were increased on Social Security in 1983, when people who are now in their twenties and thirties and forties who are working, were asked to pay more in their taxes, they were told that was to go to build up the trust fund so there would be no question that when they reach retirement age, there would be adequate funds for them.

When the President starts cutting now—what he is asking in effect is that we accept the principle that we will not just look at those trust funds as means of paying for future cost-of-living increases; we will consider them somehow as a pot that can be used to reduce the deficit; that we will try to build up the trust fund, but not to pay our legal obligations; but rather to accumulate surpluses that can offset deficits elsewhere.

Let us talk about the elderly and Social Security. Some people have this crazy notion that reducing poverty among the elderly was something we should be embarrassed about. Not just reducing poverty, reducing near-poverty.

I do not think older people ought to be living at the absolute margin, afraid that an illness is going to wipe them out or any kind of unforeseen financial exigency will wipe them out.

In 1972, Social Security was indexed. It was done a little bit too much. Since that time, look what has happened: In 1977, the Notch Act and its accompaniments reduced Social Security. Then the Consumer Price Index was recalculated, because people said old people are getting too much, because they are getting too compensated for housing costs they do not have. So the CPI that they get is not as high as the one that they used to get.

Then in 1983 their benefits were reduced further; the cost of living was cut in half by being put back for 6 months. It is not as if nothing has happened.

After all of these things have happened, after three separate reductions in the law indexing Social Security benefits, after an increase in taxes to pay for Social Security benefits, with Social Security cost-of-living already having been reduced, with people born in the notch years suffering I think unjustly, with the Social Security trust fund in surplus, Ronald Reagan says:

I need to give a 7-percent increase to the Pentagon, and therefore I have to cut in half the cost-of-living increase that Social Security recipients are entitled to.

He breaks his promise, an explicit, solemn promise. I think it is significant—as we know, our friends on the other side of the aisle have been very combative lately, and they are usually here to defend their President. I have never seen them as eloquent as I see them now by their absolute and complete silence, because they know—some of them are pretty good lawyers—when they have got an unsellable case. They know that the President of the United States made a promise; his press secretary said the promise includes not cutting benefits under cost of living, and it is being broken. It is being broken for no good fiscal reason but because some people have harbored this agenda—the gentleman from Connecticut has pointed out—they think old people have too much money, and we look at this whole Federal budget, and they look at military assistance for Marcos in the Philippines, and they look at the MX missile and star wars, and they look at some of the pork barrel projects and they say "Gee, we better cut cost-of-living increases for Social Security."

I yield again to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. MORRISON of Connecticut. I just want to say one more thing, and that is that I worry very much about where this is bound, in the future, if we start down this road. The President made his promise and it was, no more than 1 month ago that he was saying, "We're wasting a lot of time looking to Social Security to solve our deficit problem. It doesn't do anything for our deficit problem."

Just like he was right to promise not to cut, and he was right to say that, now he has reversed himself. We all know that in his budget proposal, he does not deal with the deficit; he does not get it down to any reasonable level at any time in the near future.

That means that next year, if we take this step, we will just be called on again to look at the same list of sources of cuts.

I think the senior citizens of America deserve a strong, unequivocal statement from this Congress that it is not going to be tampering with Social Security in the future, and I am very pleased that the gentleman from Massachusetts has scheduled this time so that we could lay before our colleagues how fallacious and erroneous is the proposal that to show that we are strong on reducing the deficit, which I think we are committed to doing the job, that we somehow have to beat up on senior citizens, to beat up on Social Security recipients, in order to justify doing what is right in asking fiscal prudence from other parts of our Federal budget.

Mr. FRANK. I am going to conclude, Madam Speaker. Let me just read from Mr. Robert Ball under the unanimous consent that I was given earlier that allows me to read.

Mr. Ball says:

There is a mistaken notion—that has recently gained some currency—that Social Security, because it has no needs test, is somehow a middle-class program. Social Security is a universal program, and, of course, does cover the middle class—

Although let me say as my aside, the middle class, having contributed to the program, I do not understand why anyone ought to think it is wrong, and older retired middle class people, or to benefit from them; of course they should—

but it is also our most effective antipoverty program. If there were no Social Security, there would be about 3.5 elderly poor persons for every 1 not below the poverty level.

Absent Social Security, 3.5 times as many elderly people would now be in poverty.

Social Security cuts the incidence of poverty among the elderly by over 70 percent. Nine to ten million people above 65 are kept above the rock-bottom poverty level by Social Security, and four to five million other social security beneficiaries are kept above the poverty level by their benefits. Millions more would have income only slightly above if it were not for Social Security.

Mr. Ball also points out, this is a permanent cut, not a 3-year cut. Because by reducing each year the amount people would get, you are reducing the base on which future increases come. This is a denial of billions of dollars. There are literally about $5.7 billion now, and I think it is ultimately $12 billion over 3 years that the elderly are entitled to.

People in the other body proposed, in their budget proposal, reducing Social Security benefits for 1 year. Understand that in this case, the President's compromise made it worse. Donald Regan says—the President's Chief of Staff—that he was the one, on behalf of the President, who suggested that.

So let us just quickly summarize where we are. Ronald Reagan, in his campaign for reelection, in his debates, through his press secretary, made a solemn pledge to the voters that if they voted for him and reelected him President, he would not reduce cost-of-living increases to Social Security recipients. He invited people to break that promise.

He has now joined in breaking the promise himself. The Pentagon will get a 7-percent increase. The waste will get an increase as well as what we need; the muscle as well as the fat.

Other areas of the program that he supports will get increases. The Social Security tax increase that he signed into law 2 years ago will not go to the purposes for which it was intended, if he has his way. It will not go to pay the cost-of-living increase. If he has his way, hundreds of thousands of elderly people; 650,000 the gentleman from Connecticut points out, who are now in poverty, will fall into poverty.

Millions more will have a reduction in the cost of living and you can say, Well, it is only 2 percent this year. And 2 percent next year and 2 percent the year after. So there is a 6-percent deterioration in their cost of living.

These are not people, on the whole, who are living so high on the hog—and of course, the President would also increase the amount they have to pay out for medical bills by raising Medicare fees, and some of them who happen to live in subsidized housing would have increases there, and that public transportation that many of them have to use would go up.

The President's budget is an assault on the elderly, including the poor elderly, middle-income elderly, in flagrant violation of the campaign promise he made. That promise may not be very important to him.

I think campaign promises ought to be treated as a very important obligation by all of us who go and say to people, "If you vote for me, if you give me the most sacred thing you have got in our democratic system, your ballot—from the standpoint of that system, then I will honor any kind of obligation I undertake to you."

□ 1650

The President was not forced to make that promise. He volunteered it. He reached out to make it. There is no economic justification for cutting the cost of living increase that Social Security recipients are now legally entitled to get. There is no moral justification. There is no justification in terms of the deficit.

The President is wrong to have made that promise and to have so callously broken it, and I hope that the majority of the Members of this Chamber will remember the older people have a legitimate expectation not to get rich when they retire, not to become people who are living in luxury, but they have a legitimate expectation that there will not be on retirement a drastic reduction in their standard of living. To say to older people that they are going to get a 6-percent drop in their real standard of living over the next 3 years, with everything else that is going on in Ronald Reagan's budget, is wholly unjustified, and I hope the House will not yield to it.

Madam Speaker, as previously mentioned, I am including in the RECORD at this point a letter from Robert M. Ball, and other extraneous material:

WASHINGTON DC,
January 25, 1985.

Congressman BARNEY FRANK,
House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN FRANK: I thought the enclosure might be useful to you during the current congressional consideration of possible changes in the cost-of-living adjustment for social security beneficiaries. As you can see, I think it is a bad idea.

Cordially,

ROBERT M. BALL,
(Commissioner of Social Security, 1962-73).

[Study Group on Social Security, New York, NY]

CUTTING OR SKIPPING THE COST-OF-LIVING ADJUSTMENT (COLA) FOR SOCIAL SECURITY BENEFICIARIES IS UNWISE AND UNFAIR—JANUARY 18, 1985

(By Robert M. Ball)*

1. Cutting the COLA is a benefit cut for 36 million social security beneficiaries.

The COLA is an integral part of the basic social security (old-age, survivors and disability insurance) system and the financing of the program, which is fully adequate, is designed to pay for the COLA. The COLA is not a benefit increase. The adjustment merely maintains the purchasing power of the benefit.

2. The separately and adequately financed social security program is not contributing to the deficit and should not be cut because taxes are too low to pay for other domestic and military spending.

Social security is not contributing one cent to the deficit. On the contrary, the deficit in the consolidated budget is being reduced because of social security. In order to build up reserves, social security will be taking in more than it pays out for several decades. This, of course, helps overall government financing. Social security funds that are not needed for the payment of benefits are lent to the government at interest. Thus other activities can be partially financed by borrowing from social security without the government going into the financial markets and competing with private industry.

3. The overwhelming majority of social security beneficiaries have low incomes.

Social security supplies more than half the income for two-thirds of its over-65 beneficiaries. About one-third get more than 90 percent of their income from social security. Yet the average benefit payment is less than $450 a month. An estimated 500,000 people would be pushed below the government's rock-bottom measure of dire poverty if their purchasing power were cut by a COLA freeze. If the increase in the Consumer Price Index for next year is 4 percent, the average monthly cut for beneficiaries would be $18, if 5 percent, $22.50 a month. These amounts may sound small to some, but to people largely dependent on social security, these cuts can mean choosing between food and medicine.

There is a mistaken notion—that has recently gained some currency—that social security, because it has no needs test, is somehow a middle-class program. Social security is a universal program, and, of course, does cover the middle class, but it is also our most effective anti-poverty program. If there were no social security, there would be about 3.5 elderly poor persons for every 1 now below the poverty level. Social security cuts the incidence of poverty among the elderly by over 70 percent. Nine to ten million people over 65 are kept above the rock-bottom poverty level by social security, and four to five million other social security beneficiaries are also kept above the poverty level by their benefits. Millions more would have incomes only slightly above poverty if it were not for social security. Whittling away at social security benefits will reverse the progress that has been made and plunge additional people into the poor and near-poor category.

4. Cutting the COLA for even one year is a permanent cut.

Cutting the COLA is a cut in benefits that continues year after year for all those who are on the benefit rolls at the time the COLA is due to be paid. For them, in each year that follows, a new COLA is applied to a lower benefit than would otherwise be the case so that they never catch up with inflation.

5. Cutting the COLA introduces unfair treatment among beneficiaries.

Those who are on the benefit rolls next December would have their benefits cut. On the other hand, those who apply after 1985 will receive full benefits, unless, as many will fear, the freeze is extended.

6. Modifying social security commitments in ways unrelated to social security purposes undermines faith in the program.

*Commissioner of Social Security 1962-73 and member of the 1982-83 National Commission on Social Security Reform.

Social security promises rest on past earnings and contributions and stretch into the distant future. Workers today are paying for protection that in part will not be realized for 20, 30 or 40 years in the future. To modify benefit promises in ways unrelated to social security needs or purposes would further weaken faith in the system, and, indeed, in the promises of government itself.

The law provides that social security should be inflation-proof. People are counting on it. The President has reenforced the promise in the law by an unequivocal pledge not to cut social security protection, including the cost-of-living benefits. During the debate with Mr. Mondale on October 7, 1984, the President said:

"I will never reduce social security benefits to people who are now getting them."

Two days later on October 9 an official statement went further, saying:

"The President will never stand for reduction of social security for anybody, those now getting them or future recipients."

When questioned further on October 9 about the social security cost-of-living adjustment (COLA), White House spokesman, Larry Speakes and a reporter had this exchange:

Question: "You say that benefits will not be reduced. The law includes a provision for increases in benefits based on cost of living. Does this guarantee those increases as well?"

Mr. Speakes: "Yes. This is the law."

Question: "And you say it doesn't include—that there'll be no tampering and delaying or trimming of cost of living?"

Mr. Speakes: "No tampering. No nothing."

The American people voted in 1984 partly on the basis of this commitment made by the President so that for both sustantive reasons and because the integrity of the Presidency is at stake, social security should not be part of the deficit reduction effort.

7. Cutting the COLA will break the agreement implicit in the 1983 Amendments.

All during 1981 and 1982, social security beneficiaries—36 million people, principally elderly retired persons, totally disabled people, widows and motherless and fatherless children—were terrorized by the fear that their benefits would stop or be reduced. There were almost daily reports of social security "bankruptcy." Under this daily pounding, a high proportion of the 120 million contributors to the program became convinced that they would never receive the benefits toward which they were contributing. The Nation was greatly disturbed by the possibility that the government might turn its back on the commitments it had made over the last 50 years. The 1983 Amendments to the Social Security Act restored fiscal solvency to social security and have reassured people that their benefits are safe. It seems very unwise to open up the question of benefit cuts again. Failure to keep social security benefits up to date with purchasing power would be particularly resented because OASDI is now adequately financed, and the benefit reduction clearly would be made solely for the purpose of reducing the overall deficit.

After a year of study, the National Commission on Social Security Reform, appointed jointly by the President and the Republican and Democratic leadership of the Congress, agreed on a set of recommendations which were endorsed by 12 of its 15 members. These recommendations became the basis for the 1983 Amendments to the Social Security Act.

No one who supported the plan liked all parts of it. There was some pain for everyone involved in social security, but not too much for any one group:

Beneficiaries had the cost-of-living adjustment postponed and put permanently on a calendar year basis, a move which amounted to approximately a 2½ percent benefit cut over the average beneficiary's lifetime.

Contribution rate increases were speeded up for both workers and employers, with employers paying more than under previous law in 1984, 1988 and 1989 and employees paying more in 1988 and 1989.

The self-employed are now required to pay social security rates that are comparable to what is paid by, and on behalf of employees, a considerable increase over what they have been paying in the past.

Higher-income social security beneficiaries (less than 10 percent of all beneficiaries) will for the first time pay an income tax on one-half their social security benefits, with the proceeds of the tax going to support social security.

Those non-profit employees not previously covered (about 15 percent of the total) and newly hired Federal employees have been brought under the system, as have members of Congress and top officials of the Executive Branch.

The Federal Government speeded up its payment for military service credits and will pay for the refundable tax credit for employees in the year 1984 and for certain tax credits for the self-employed.

To bring the separately financed OASDI system into balance, agreement was struck among many diverse interests. To now impose additional sacrifice on one group—beneficiaries—is a violation of that agreement.

8. Keeping benefits up to date with the full cost of living makes sense.

Since the amendments of 1972, the purchasing power of social security benefits has been protected against inflation. The provision was adopted as a conservative measure because its sponsors believed that an automatic provision for meeting increases in the cost of living would tend to prevent ad hoc benefit increases and other expensive changes in the program that went beyond keeping the benefits up to date with price changes. It has turned out to be one of the most valuable provisions in the social security program.

It makes sense to decide on the proper level of benefits that people should get at the time of first receipt, and then to maintain the purchasing power of that benefit. It doesn't make sense to provide a given level of benefits at the time of retirement or total disability, or to survivors on the death of a wage earner and then to let inflation cut the value of those benefits so that people in their seventies or eighties have less than when they retired.

CONCLUSION

After the turmoil of 1981 and 1982 social security is now doing just fine. Let's keep it that way.

SECTION IV—SOCIAL SECURITY

"A one-year freeze in Social Security benefits would have been tolerable. But reducing them by 2 percent a year for each of the next three years is grossly unfair and an ominous precedent. Holding down the cost-of-living adjustments year after year means that retired people get poorer as they get older."—The Washington Post Editorial, April 7, 1985.

The most controversial proposal in the new Reagan/Republican budget calls for a reduction in the annual cost-of-living adjustment (COLA) for Social Security. The proposal is controversial because it would produce even larger cutbacks in Social Security than the COLA freeze adopted by the Senate Budget Committee; because it would have an especially harsh effect on many low-income people; and because it represents abandonment of the promise President Reagan made repeatedly during the 1984 campaign.

The proposed COLA reduction would cut Social Security spending by $3.0 billion in fiscal year 1986 and a total of $22.7 billion over the three-year period fiscal year 1986 through fiscal year 1988, compared to the amounts needed to maintain the benefits mandated by current law.

DETAILS OF THE PROPOSAL

The new Reagan/Republican proposal would essentially reduce the COLA by two percentage points per year over the next three years, but with a minimum 2 percent COLA guaranteed regardless of the inflation rate. If the Administration's inflation projections prove accurate, this proposal would cut the COLA roughly in half.

Specifically, President Reagan and the Senate Republicans propose to set the annual Social Security COLA at 2 percent for each of the next three years, provided that inflation does not exceed the rates currently projected by the Administration (4.1 percent in fiscal year 1986, 4.3 percent in fiscal year 1987, and 4.1 percent in fiscal year 1988). If actual inflation exceeds these projections, and additional increase equal to the excess of actual inflation over projected inflation would be added to the basic 2 percent COLA.

For example, if inflation is 4.1 percent next year (the rate projected by the Administration) the COLA would be 2 percent. If inflation is 5 percent the COLA would be 2.9 percent (the basic 2 percent plus 0.9 percent for the excess of actual over expected inflation). If inflation is only 3 percent, the COLA would be 2 percent.

The "guaranteed COLA" issue

President Reagan and other Republicans have sought to portray their COLA proposal as a benefit liberalization, since their plan would provide a guaranteed 2 percent COLA regardless of the inflation rate, whereas under current law no COLA is provided in years when inflation falls below 3 percent. It should be noted, however, that current law merely delays the COLA in such circumstances, rather than canceling it, with a catch-up increase provided once inflation rises above the 3 percent threshold. Thus, while current law contains the possibility of a temporary COLA delay, the Reagan/Republican proposal contains the virtual certainty of the premanent cancellation of part of the COLA due in each of the next three years.

In addition, the Republicans' guaranteed COLA would only provide protection against a largely hypothetical possibility. Neither the Office of Management and Budget, the Congressional Budget Office (CBO), nor private forecasters currently expect the inflation rate to fall below the 3 percent threshold that would trigger a Social Security COLA delay during the next three years.

EFFECT ON BENEFICIARIES

Based on Administration assumptions, the new Reagan/Republican proposal would reduce Social Security benefits by 1.9 percent in fiscal year 1986 and 5.7 percent in fiscal year 1988, compared to the benefits that would be received under current law. This reduction would cost the average recipient $81 in fiscal year 1986, $198 in fiscal year 1987, and $314 in fiscal year 1988, according to an analysis by the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities.

By the time the three-year COLA reduction specified by the new budget compromise is fully phased-in, it would cost beneficiaries almost 50 percent more than the one-year COLA freeze originally approved by the Senate Budget Committee. By fiscal year 1988, the one-year COLA freeze would reduce benefits 3.9 percent below the levels mandated by current law, compared to the 5.7 percent benefit cut under the new Republican plan.

Impact on the poor

Of particular concern is the effect of the proposed COLA reduction on low-income beneficiaries, many of whom are heavily dependent on income from Social Security and related programs. For example, CBO estimates that Social Security (along with Railroad Retirement) provides 82 percent of total income for elderly recipient families classified as poor, and 79 percent of total income for elderly recipient families classified as near poor (that is, with incomes less than 25 percent above the poverty line). In addition, Social Security is a very important source of income for many low-income persons who are not elderly but who are disabled, orphaned, or widows or widowers caring for children.

The Republicans propose to partially alleviate this problem by increasing benefits under the Supplemental Security Income (SSI) program—which provides cash assistance to aged, blind, or disabled people with very low incomes. Many poor people affected by the COLA cut do not receive SSI, however, partially because of the stringent income and assets tests required to qualify, and partially because some otherwise eligible people are evidently reluctant to seek what they perceive to be "welfare" benefits.

CBO estimates that the SSI benefit increase would offset the COLA reduction for only about one-third of the poor families affected, and for less than one-fifth of the near poor families affected. Even with the SSI benefit increase, CBO calculates that an estimated 2.9 million poor families will suffer a net loss (averaging $200 per year) and that another 1.9 million near poor families will suffer a net loss (averaging $280 per year). Further, according to CBO, the net effect of the COLA reduction and SSI benefit increase would be to increase the number of people living in poverty by 570,000—380,000 of whom are elderly.*

PRESIDENT REAGAN'S PROMISES

The proposed cutbacks in Social Security cost-of-living adjustments have become particularly controversial because they represent abandonment of firm promises made by President Reagan during the 1984 campaign to oppose any cuts in Social Security benefits.

Further, the Administration is hardly in a position to argue that these cuts were forced on the President by Senate Republicans. As noted above, the Social Security cuts contained in the new Reagan/Republican compromise are considerably deeper than those proposed by the Senate Budget Committee. What's more, White House chief of staff Donald Regan has told the press that it was he who suggested the three-year COLA cutback, and that he made this proposal "on behalf of the President."

Incredibly, when asked by the press whether the Democrats would "beat up on him" for breaking his campaign promises, the President responded, "Well, if they do they'll be lying in their teeth."

The following page contains examples of some of the statements made last year by President Reagan and his press secretary pledging to preserve full Social Security benefits.

"I will never stand for a reduction of the Social Security benefits to the people that are now getting them . . ."—President Reagan, Presidential Debate, October 7, 1984.

"The President will never stand for reduction of Social Security benefits for anybody."—White House Deputy Press Secretary Larry Speakes, October 9, 1984.

Deputy Press Secretary Larry Speakes was asked: "You say that benefits will not be reduced. The law includes a provision for increases in benefits based on cost of living. Does this guarantee those increases as well?" Speakes answered: "Yes. The law is the law."—White House Briefing, October 9, 1984.

"We're never going to take away from those people who are dependent on Social Security, now or in the future."—President Reagan, October 10, 1984.

"I will absolutely battle against any suggestion of reducing or taking the benefits these people on Social Security are getting. . . . They're going to get those benefits the way they are."—President Reagan, October 12, 1984.

"I made it plain that I would never hold still for any change in Social Security that pulled the rug out from the people that were depending on it."—President Reagan, October 16, 1984.

"The President has made it emphatic that he will not touch Social Security in any shape or fashion."—White House Deputy Press Secretary Larry Speakes, December 6, 1984.

AVERAGE SOCIAL SECURITY BENEFICIARY TO LOSE $1,667 OVER 5 YEARS UNDER NEW WHITE HOUSE BUDGET

LOW INCOME PROGRAMS TO BE CUT $25 BILLION OVER NEXT 3 YEARS

The average Social Security beneficiary would lose $1,667 over the next five years under the new budget plan announced by President Reagan and Senate Republican leaders last week, according to a new analysis by the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities.

The losses would come from reductions in Social Security cost-of-living adjustments and increases in the monthly premiums charged to elderly Medicare beneficiaries.

The analysis also finds that the new budget would also reduce programs for low income persons by $25 billion over the next three years—$4.6 billion in FY 1986, $8.7 billion in FY 1987, and $11.4 billion in FY 1988.

The largest reductions in the low income area would come from the elimination of rural housing programs for low income persons and major reductions in Medicaid, the analysis reports. The cuts over the next three years in Medicaid would be five times larger under the new White House/Republican budget than under the budget plan adopted last month by the Senate Budget Committee.

The analysis is based on budget estimates from the Senate Budget Committee and the Office of Management and Budget.

Social Security reductions

The analysis reports that reductions in Social Security benefits would, for 1988 and all succeeding years, be larger than those adopted in March by the Senate Budget Committee.

The Budget Committee proposal to freeze Social Security cost-of-living adjustments for one year would reduce benefits by $8.1 billion in 1988 and subsequent years, the analysis notes. But while the new budget plan reduces benefits less than the Senate plan in 1986, by 1988 it represents a $12.1 billion a year reduction.

"Over the course of time, beneficiaries would lose substantially more under this plan than under the Committee plan," according to the analysis. "This is because the Budget Committee plan reduced benefits about 4 percent by canceling the 1986 cost-of-living reduction. By contrast, the new plan cuts benefits about 6 percent for 1988 and subsequent years—by lowering the cost-of-living adjustment 2 percent next year, an additional 2 percent in 1987, and a further 2 percent in 1988."

The average Social Security loss per beneficiary reaches $314 by 1988 and at least $1,257 over the next five years, the Center reported.

The new budget plan also raises the monthly premiums that elderly persons must pay for Medicare coverage. These premiums are subtracted from monthly Social Security checks—and as a result, the checks will fall still further behind inflation, according to the Center.

In 1988, the average elderly Social Security beneficiary will lose $385 from these Social Security and Medicare changes combined, the Center noted. In 1990, the average loss will reach $512.

Over the next five years, the average cumulative loss from both Social Security and Medicare will be $1,667 per beneficiary.

HURTING THOSE WHO NEED HELP THE MOST

(By William V. Shannon)

The budget "compromise" worked out by President Reagan and the Senate Republican leaders is as morally despicable as anything that has come out of Washington in the last four years.

Along a trail of broken promises and political doubletalk, Reagan is once again on the attack against old-age pensioners, the needy sick, hard-pressed farmers, unemployed teenagers and college students from working-class families. Programs that help make our inner cities livable for the poor such as mass transit, low-income housing and general revenue-sharing would be sharply reduced or canceled.

All this is being done in the name of reducing the deficit. The theory is that the deficit, which is now $213 billion, could be brought below $100 billion by 1988.

There are two things wrong with this theory. The first is that it does not fit the facts. In February, the Congressional Budget Office, using more cautious, and therefore probably more accurate, assumptions about economic growth and interest rates, forecast that even if Congress approved all the Reagan spending cuts the annual federal budget deficit would remain around $185 billion for the rest of the 1980s.

*These CBO estimates all include the effects of the proposed COLA reduction for Federal civilian and military retirement and Railroad Retirement, as well as for Social Security. These estimates are based on Administration inflation assumptions and 1983 income levels; dollar losses are stated in 1983 dollars.

The second falsehood underlying this compromise is that cuts in spending could ever bring the budget into balance. As fast as those cuts are being made, the money saved by them is being used up by the higher-interest payments on the rising national debt.

The reckless Reagan tax cut of 1981 produced these huge budget deficits. Only a substantial tax increase can bring them back to a manageable size. The 1981 act reduced federal government revenue for the five years from 1982 through 1987 by $750 billion. If the old 1981 rates were still in effect, the current deficit would be reduced by two-thirds. The remaining one-third is accounted for by Reagan's increases in military spending.

The Reagan tax reduction and the accompanying budget was not an economically or morally neutral act. It was an economically unnecessary and monstrously unjust transfer of wealth from the poorest, weakest, most vulnerable people in our society to the strongest and the richest.

In thinking about the Reagan budget compromise in coming months, the public should keep one text in mind. It is from William Greider's "The Education of David Stockman" in the Atlantic Monthly of December 1981 in which Reagan's chief budget adviser is described after the tax-cutting orgy of that year.

"It seemed to leave a bad taste in his mouth, as though the Democratic process had finally succeeded in shocking him by its intensity and its greed. Once again, Stockman participated in the trading—special tax concessions for oil-lease holders and real estate tax shelters, and generous loopholes that virtually eliminated the corporate income tax. Stockman sat in the room and saw it happen.

"Do you realize the greed that came to the forefront?" Stockman asked with wonder. "The hogs were really feeding. The greed level, the level of opportunism, just got out of control."

To trim the deficits created by this hoggishness, Reagan, Stockman and the Senate Republican leaders have been squeezing food stamps for the marginally poor and eliminating public-service jobs for the marginally employable. Now, as part of their latest "compromise," they propose to take another whack at the old-age pensioners. The elderly would have to pay more for their Medicare protection. They would also have their cost-of-living adjustment (COLA) restricted to 2 percent.

Many forget that as part of the 1983 bipartisan agreement that put the Social Security system on a financially sound basis for the immediate future, pensioners had to accept a "one time only" COLA delay for six months. That was not just a postponement; it was a perpetual reduction in benefits because each subsequent cost-of-living adjustment is based on one's existing benefit level. Once a step on the escalator is lost, it cannot be regained.

How well off are these old people who Reagan has chosen to make fresh sacrifices? The large majority of people over 65 have incomes between $4,000 and $15,000. Single retirees (mostly widows) have a median monthly benefit below $450. Anyone here want to volunteer to pay his own rent, fuel bills, telephone bill, and food and clothing costs on $450 a month?

(William V. Shannon is a contributing columnist.)

● Mr. OBERSTAR, Madam Speaker, Just 6 months ago, President Reagan, as well as the overwhelming majority of candidates for the House and Senate promised the American people that they would not support further cuts in Social Security.

The 1983 amendments strengthened the Old Age, Survivors, and Disability Insurance Trust Funds by accelerating tax increases, delaying cost-of-living adjustments, and ignoring a 2.4 percent change in the consumer price index. There is no financial justification for cutting benefits to present or future retirees. The trust funds are not in trouble today, they are accumulating surpluses.

The only significant change which has occurred since last fall is that the elections are behind us.

My colleagues here have discussed the adverse impact of a 2-percent per year COLA reduction on today's annuitants. I want to discuss the fairness issue for workers age 59 through 64 who are still in the work force.

Substantial benefit reductions for future retirees were made in 1977 when the flawed benefit formula of the 1972 amendments was corrected. A new 1977 benefit computation formula was designed so that a worker with average wages throughout his worklife would receive, at age 65, a benefit equal to 42 percent of preretirement income. That goal was to be achieved by averaging indexed lifetime earnings up to age 62 an then applying all cost-of-living adjustments granted after the worker reached age 62.

If Congress approved the budget agreement recently worked out between the Senate Republicans and the White House, workers reaching age 62 this year—will have their benefits reduced by 6.5 percent and will retire at age 65 with approximately 40.1 percent of preretirement income. Individuals reaching age 62 in either 1984 or 1986 will have their full entitlement reduced by 4.25 percent; workers reaching 62 in 1983 or 1987 will face a 2-percent reduction in the benefit which would otherwise be payable.

The proposed Senate Republican—Reagan administration budget will worsen the notch effect we have all heard so much about for those born in 1921 and create another notch for those born between 1922 and 1925.

More important, for those born in 1923, who reach age 62 this year, we will have come halfway to the administration's aborted 1981 Social Security proposals which had as their objective a reduction in benefits to only 38 percent of preretirement income for average wage earners.

The oldest of our retirees cannot afford to absorb a cumulative 6.5 percent reduction in their purchasing power because they are least likely to have resources to supplement Social Security annuities. Yet, comparatively, the oldest retirees are taking the smallest cut because younger retirees and workers close to retirement age will receive reduced benefits for longer periods of time.

Prior to 1972 when cost-of-living adjustments were put on automatic pilot, increases were granted periodically to insure that retirees would benefit from the increased productivity of the active work force. The chief criticism of those sporadic increases was that the Congress was overreacting to political pressures and granting increases related to wage increases that were greater than price increases, and that retirees were being over-compensated.

The automatic increase provisions was to keep retirees even with inflation. Never before in the history of the Social Security Program, however, has Congress set out to systematically reduce the purchasing power of the Nation's elderly by stipulating that benefits will be kept below price increases.

If Congress votes to reduce or freeze Social Security benefits, the effect will be to blame the old, the sick, the poor, and make them pay for excessive military expenditures and inappropriate tax reductions granted in 1981. That budget policy cannot and will not serve the long-range best interests of this Nation.●

Mr. FRANK. Madam Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the subject of my special order on today.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

AMBASSADOR KIRKPATRICK'S THOUGHTFUL SPEECH

HON. ROBERT H. MICHEL
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 29, 1985

● Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, on April 16, 1985, Ambassador Jeane J. Kirkpatrick gave an address on our Nation's response to totalitarianism. I want to share it with you because I believe she has reminded all of us of what it means to defend our values with strong policies instead of wishful thinking.

At this point I insert the body of the text of her speech in the RECORD:

REMARKS OF AMBASSADOR JEANE J. KIRKPATRICK
